So, for all those reasons—honesty, integrity, competence, fairness, openness—I feel very strongly that the Senate should act and act unanimously today in approving his nomination.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the President of the United States has submitted to the Senate the name of James Baker as his choice to undertake the duties of Secretary of the Treasury. This position has, in all periods of our history, been one of the most important and responsible offices of the U.S. Government. It is especially so at the present moment. In the coming months, the new Secretary of the Treasury will be called upon to show wisdom, courage, and responsibility as he works with the President and the Congress in seeking a remedy for the massive deficits which now face the accounts of the Government.

I believe the President has made a fine choice in James Baker. I have worked with him in the past on several occasions, and have always found him to be knowledgeable and thoughtful in his approach to the problems facing our Government, and willing to listen to a different point of view. He has broad experience both within the Government and in the private sector. He will bring to the office of Secretary of the Treasury a proven record of ability to deal with major problems and effectiveness in working with Congress and with the various agencies of the executive branch.

I joined the other members of the Committee on Finance in their unanimous vote to report Mr. Baker's nomination, and I shall vote in favor of his confirmation by the Senate.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am very happy that a man with Jim Baker's abilities is willing to continue offering himself for public service. Mr. Baker's business experience and his tenure at the White House serve him in good stead as the new director of the President's plan for tax policy.

In his hearing before the Finance Committee, Mr. Baker made it clear that he will participate in policy discussions about energy taxation and other risk oriented enterprises. I am pleased that as he serves as Secretary, the Nation will have the benefit of his knowledge of these fields. During the Finance Committee hearing on his nomination, I gave Mr. Baker a copy of the recent Interstate Oil Compact Commission study which anticipates the impact of the Treasury's tax proposal on intangible drilling costs. Mr. Baker has agreed to read the study. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD following these brief comments so that the Members of the Senate can determine the impact of these proposals on employment, production, and income in the domestic energy industry so vital to our national security.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERSTATE OIL COMPACT COMMISSION

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLAHOMA.—More than six billion barrels of oil will remain undiscovered and 630,000 jobs will be lost if the Regan tax proposal is adopted, a task force of the Interstate Oil Compact Commission stated today.

The task force was charged with determining the impact of several tax proposals with emphasis on the proposal advanced by Secretary of the Treasury Donald Regan on the state governments and economy. This is the second phase of the preliminary reports and focuses on tax treatment of drilling expenses.

The first, released last week, predicted the loss of 90,000 jobs and 850 million barrels of oil if the Congress repeals the existing depletion allowance. The study shows that one out of every 12 stripper wells would be abandoned and an increase in the trade deficit of $750 million would occur if Regan's proposal is passed.

The IOCC is an organization of 30 petroleum producing states concerned with the conservation of oil and gas through waste prevention at the production level.

Cash available within the industry for drilling would also be sharply reduced, finds the report commissioned by Gov. George Nigh and Gov. Mark White of Texas, IOCC joint chairmen.

The reduction in the states' drilling activities would result in a substantial loss of jobs, petroleum reserves available to production, and revenue.

The Treasury Department's proposal, which repeals the expensing of intangible drilling costs, would cut the amount of investment capital available for drilling from $25 billion to $15 billion.

Presently 38 percent of the funds available for drilling of oil is generated outside the industry from other sources such as investors and bank loans. Sixty-two percent of the funds available for drilling is generated within the industry from oil and gas revenues.

As drilling declines so will the amount of funds available within the industry for investment, the task force found.

Under the Treasury Department's plan, the nation could also expect: A reduction of 203,000 of the total number of wells projected to be drilled between 1986–1991. A reduction in oil and gas revenues of $6 billion over the next five years. A reduction of 838,293 barrels of oil per day by 1991. The U.S. presently produces approximately 8.5 million barrels a day. The loss of an average of $360 million from gross production tax receipts annually from 1986–1991.

It is expected that industry expenditures will drop by one-third by 1986 due to uncertainties and projected reductions in third party funding will fall by a like fraction due to uncertainties in the tax treatment. It is estimated that a one million dollar drop in drilling expenditures will result in a loss of 50 jobs, 32 in direct petroleum industry jobs and 18 in related fields.

These figures reflect the results of the second phase of a three-part study prepared by the RAM Group of Oklahoma City, a management consulting organization, under the supervision of the IOCC staff. Phase I, covering the impact of the loss of depletion allowance on low volume or "stripper" wells, was released Jan. 9. Phase III on enhanced oil recovery will be released Jan. 24.

Nigh and White directed the IOCC to measure the impact on the production, taxes, and the economy of the oil producing states if any of the tax revision plans circulating Washington are adopted.

Sam Hammons of Oklahoma City and Charles A. Moore of Houston head the task force. Each is the official representative of the governor to the IOCC.

Reduction in drilling rigs (per year)	1,219	461	159
Reduction in oil and gas reserves added [1] (Boe)	6,304,000,000	1,974,000,000	928,000,000
Reduction in oil and gas production (Boe per day)	838,293	262,479	123,450

Reduction in severance tax payments (per year)	$360,000,000	$114,000,000	$63,000,000

[1] Wells drilled and reserves are cumulative 1986 thru 1991. All others are averages per year.

Basis.—Industry expenditures are reduced by one-third in 1986 due to uncertainty and reduced third party funding. Third party funding is reduced by one-half in 1986 due to uncertainty in tax treatment. After 1986 industry expenditures remain at two-thirds of 1984 levels plus or minus cash flow effects from accelerated tax payments. After 1986 third party funding remains at two-thirds of 1984 levels plus or minus cash flow effects from accelerated tax payments. Reserves are added at a $12 per barrel oil of equivalent from 1986–91. The 1986–91 average wellhead price of oil and gas combined is $19.63 per barrel of oil equivalent. A reduction in drilling expenditures of $1 million results in a loss of 50 jobs (32 direct petroleum industry jobs and 18 indirect jobs).

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, there is no objection, so far as we can see, on this side of the aisle to the confirmation of the nomination of Jim Baker. One of the things which pleased me and my colleagues on this side of the aisle during the hearings before the Senate Committee on Finance was the fact that his responses to questions were so well considered and the fact that he openly stated that he did not buy the entire package as was presented by his predecessor in tax simplification. Of course, there are some who are opposed to certain sectors of the package; there are those who favor certain provisions of the package; but it seems there are hardly any who support the package in toto.

Jim Baker recognized that. The fact that he recognized that is an indication that he is guided by his fairmindedness. His stress on fairness of a tax measure over simplification of our tax system, I think, was very impressive. I, for one, was very impressed by his presentation.

I should point out that the vote in the Committee on Finance to report his nomination out favorably was unanimous.

I rise here to join the chairman of the Finance Committee in the remarks which he made when naming all the attributes of the nominee. I might even go to the extent of saying that I do hope that the confirmation will be unanimous.

I yield the floor.

Mr. PROXMIRE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Hawaii yield time to me to speak on the nomination?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

WHY THE SENATE SHOULD CONFIRM AN UNQUALIFIED SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President on Wednesday, January 23d, the Finance Committee of the U.S. Senate questioned James Baker, the nominee for Secretary of the Treasury. They questioned him for 2 hours and 20 minutes. I have read that testimony and I could not find a single question directed at the qualifications of Mr. Baker to be Secretary of the Treasury. The Constitution under which we operate, and which we swear to uphold, charges each of us in this body to advise and consent to the President's nominations for the top policymaking positions in our Government.

The Senate, in my judgment, has a deplorable record of neglect in discharging this constitutional advise and consent responsibility. Think of it: for 25 years, the Senate has not rejected a single Presidential Cabinet nominee. Not one. Many of the nominees have been well qualified but dozens have not. Since 1959 the Senate approved them all. In fact, only twice in this century has the Senate turned down a Cabinet nominee. It is a disgraceful record. There are few, if any, more important positions in our Government than Secretary of the Treasury. This is especially true today when the No. 1 domestic problem that confronts this country is a series of immense deficits that has plagued this Government for each of the last 3 years and promises to plague us for the next 4 years, during which Mr. Baker will be Secretary of the Treasury. How do the deficits challenge the qualifications of the Secretary of the Treasury? They do so in the following ways:

First, the deficits require that the Secretary and the Treasury Department must raise massive sums by borrowing from both domestic and foreign sources. These will not be routine borrowings of the kind that this country has made during most of our history. The size of Treasury issues will have a far more profound effect on our own capital markets, on the interest rates that tens of millions of American consumers and millions of American businessmen will pay. It will have an increasing effect on the cost of capital in foreign countries throughout the world. The timing of this borrowing, the maturity of the debt instruments the Treasury chooses, will have a critical effect on the economic performance of this country and countries throughout the free world. The next Secretary of the Treasury will have to handle this borrowing with great skill.

Second, it requires that the Secretary of the Treasury must work in close cooperation and understanding with the Federal Reserve Board. The Secretary, especially James Baker as Secretary, will speak with special clout and authority with respect to the Federal Reserve. Neither the current Chairman of the Fed nor the Board as a whole are easily intimidated. But Mr. Baker comes to the Treasury Department from a specially close and unusually influential relationship with a very strong and popular President. When this new Secretary of the Treasury talks, the Fed will listen. And why not? He will talk with the same authority as the President of the United States. Do you say we can rely on Chairman Paul Volcker? No one will intimidate him? Well, Mr. President, within a year or so Chairman Paul Volcker may leave the Federal Reserve Board. At his confirmation hearing in July 1983, in answer to questions I asked him, Chairman Paul Volcker took the unusual precaution to warn the Banking Committee that he would not commit himself to serve out his 4-year term. Volcker further said that he thought that ideally the Fed Chairman's term should end on January 31, 1 year after the President is elected. That would end Volcker's service on January 31, 1986.

So President Reagan might appoint a new Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board next January. By that time Secretary Baker will be firmly in charge at the Treasury Department. Secretary Baker will probably play a big part in picking the next Fed Chairman and he will be in a very strong position to lean on him. Will Treasury Secretary Baker lean on the next Fed Chairman? Secretary Baker will next January be faced with the mammoth problem of borrowing immense sums without driving American or world interest rates our of sight. There will be a very great temptation for this new Treasury Secretary to insulate our American capital markets and, indeed, the world capital markets from this huge borrowing. Possibly for the rest of the Reagan term. How can he do that? He can do that at least temporarily by pushing the Fed to buy an ever increasing share of the Treasury borrowing. So why not? If that will keep interest rates down, why not do it? Here is why not: The danger here is that this kind of policy could serve the short-term interest of our country for a year or two or even more, but in the long run it would have the consequence that monetizing the debt always has. It would mean inflation and big inflation.

Mr. President, what do we know about this new Secretary of the Treasury and his attitude toward an independent Federal Reserve Board? We know the Federal Reserve Board has usually been able to stand fast against inflationary policies. We know just about every Congress and just about every administration—this is not partisan. Democrats and Republicans are all the same on this kind of thing—wants those easy money policies to hold down interest rates. We know they especially want these easy money policies when deficits threaten to hold up or push up interest rates. So how about James Baker? What effect will his administration of the Treasury Department have on the Federal Reserve Board? What is the "book" on Baker. The day that the shift of James Baker to Treasury was announced, some newspapers featured in their stories that Baker has been a "Fed basher." Now of course James Baker is not a basher of any kind. He is far too skillful and subtle—and I might add effective—to betray such an instinct. Then why the reports? Many of the first press reports indicated that in his relatively anonymous role as White House Chief of Staff, Baker was one of those pushing hardest for an easy money, or let-the-Fed-buy-the-deficit policy. What did the confirmation hearing disclose about this critical issue? At the hearing, Mr. Baker simply said he believed in very close cooperation between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Fed and frequent—in fact weekly—meetings between the two. Baker also said he believed the term of the Fed Chairman should be coterminous with the term of the President. That would in effect assure the President of having his own Fed Chairman. What all this adds up to Mr. President, is that in confirming Mr. Baker we may be starting the beginning of the end of the independence of the Federal Reserve Board. The irony is that we would do this right after an independent Fed—the only game in town fighting inflation—has just achieved the single most impressive economic attainment in the last decade: bringing runaway inflation under control.

Third, at his confirmation hearings, Mr. Baker told the Finance Committee that he would become the President's chief economic adviser and spokesman on economic issues. This would be a great challenge for any Secretary. Is Mr. Baker qualified to meet it? Is he intelligent? He is, indeed. Has he demonstrated that intelligence in matters of great complexity and difficulty? He certainly has done exactly that as the President's Chief of Staff throughout the President's first term. During that first term, Mr. Baker was not the President's prime economic adviser. But he was very close to the President and there is no evidence that he disagreed with any of the major economic policies pursued by the administration. Those policies have given this country both the deepest recession since the Great Depression and a very strong recovery. What was the prime feature of the Reagan-Baker economic policy during this 1981 to 1984 economic roller coaster ride? The obvious hallmark of the recovery was the record-breaking, massive series of deficits, rising from a record-smashing $109 billion in 1982, to $195 billion in 1983 and $175 billion in 1984 with more sure to come. The vast stimulus of those deficits has given this country a truly great economic year in 1984. The economy grew by 6.8 percent, the best growth year since 1951, 33 years ago. The stimulus of the massive deficits undoubtedly provided the main steam for that exuberant recovery. But the deficits did something else that was both welcome and surprising. The deficits, oddly enough also helped maintain the great improvement in the inflation rate that tough Federal Reserve Board monetary policy earned. Inflation in 1982, 1983, and 1984 stayed at or below 4 percent each year, an astonishing performance compared to the more than 13-percent inflation the economy suffered in 1979 and more than 12-percent inflation in 1980.

How did deficits help do that? The deficits helped hold down inflation by so increasing foreign borrowing which required foreigners to sell their currencies and buy the dollar that foreign currencies dropped sharply in value. The American dollar shot up in value. So Americans could buy more cheaply from abroad. Even more important, the deficits, by bloating the dollar and cheapening foreign imports, prevented American business from increasing prices. They could not do so without losing business to foreign imports.

So the Reagan-Baker economic policy worked like a charm during 1983–84 recovery. Then, why not have more of the same big growth, low inflation medicine? Why not confirm Mr. Baker as Secretary of the Treasury and as the chief economic adviser to the President? The answer is that this Reagan-Baker deficit policy is great in the short run as the 1984 economic growth and low inflation figures show, but for the long run? Watch out. It is stricly bad news.

And yet, this Senator will vote for Mr. Baker, but he will do so with serious misgivings. James Baker, as we have said, is an intelligent man. That is enormously valuable in any position of importance, such as running the Treasury Department. He will have the full confidence of the President. He has worked well with Congress in the past and will do so again. But he has virtually no relevant background to serve as Secretary of the Treasury. I would happily vote for him for Attorney General. Why not the Treasury? Because Mr. Baker has had little experience in dealing with any of the specific responsibilities of the Treasury Department. He has no training in economics. He has written nothing about economic policy. He has not had one day's experience in handling any of the kind of duties the Secretary of Treasury will have to handle. But, frankly, this Senator knows he must hold this administration to a much lower standard of qualification than other administrations. I know that if Mr. Baker should be rejected, the next nominee will be even less qualified. So with great respect for Mr. Baker's fine personal qualities, while deploring his lack of significant qualifications, I will cast a reluctant vote for his confirmation.

Finally, Mr. President, Mr. Baker has courteously written me a letter setting forth his qualifications to be Secretary of the Treasury. I believe they show him to be qualified for many offices, particularly, as I have said, Attorney General, certainly President of the United States—of course, a lot of people are qualified for that—but Secretary of the Treasury? No. And as the principal economic adviser to the President, you have to be kidding. Absolutely not.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being on objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 25, 1985.

Hon. WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR PROXMIRE: I have just had lunch with Bob Dole who suggested that I drop you this note about my private sector and government experience in order to assist you in judging my qualifications to be Secretary of the Treasury.

I graduated from your alma mater (The Hill School) in 1948. I graduated from Princeton University in 1952 with a B.A. degree. My law degree was obtained, following two years active duty in the Marine Corps, from the University of Texas (with honors) in 1957. From 1957 to 1975 I practiced law as both an associate and partner of Andrews & Kurth in Houston, Texas—the fifth largest firm in Texas. I was a member of the management committee of that firm and my practice was of a general business law nature. I did quite a bit of banking and securities law work. I also did general corporate law including mergers, acquisitions, etc. I have served on the Board of Directors of three banks and one bank holding company. In August, 1975, I was appointed Under Secretary of Commerce by President Ford and I served in this capacity until May, 1976, when President Ford asked me to move to the President Ford Committee. For several months during this time I was the acting Secretary of Commerce. I was a regular participant in meetings of the Economic Policy Board which was the top economic policy coordinating entity in the Ford Administration.

In August, 1976, President Ford asked me to be the Chairman of the President Ford Committee and I served as such until I resumed my law practice in 1977, which continued until I entered government on January 20, 1981 as President Reagan's Chief of Staff. (I did take time off during that period, however, to run for Attorney General of Texas, to organize and serve as Chairman of the George Bush for President Committee and to serve as Senior Advisor to the Reagan-Bush Committee.)

On January 20, 1981 I became Chief of Staff and Assistant to President Reagan. As such I have attended Economic Summits with him and accompanied him on other foreign trips. I have worked extensively with both Dave Stockman and Don Regan in the development of our budget and tax policy recommendations for the President, and I have assisted our efforts to implement the President's policies by chairing our legislative strategy group here in the White House. I have been a Presidentially designated member of the National Security Council for four years and I am a member of the various Cabinet Councils which are functioning within the executive branch.

I hope this is helpful to you in determining whether or not you will vote to confirm my nomination as Secretary of the Treasury.

I know you do not make it a practice of seeing nominees in advance of their confirmation hearings, but I would look forward to visiting with you at a later date if I am confirmed by the Senate.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES A. BAKER III,
Chief of Staff and Assistant to the President.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I will yield such time to the Senator from Mississippi as he may need.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I rise to indicate my strong support for the nomination of James Baker to be Secretary of Treasury. In the time that he has been in Washington, I think Jim Baker has proven he is a man of great ability and dedication and can work in a very constructive way in this administration to help set straight some of the economic problems that we confront. I have a very high regard for him personally, having had the privilege and honor of observing his work as a member of this administration. I compliment the President on his selection of Jim Baker for this important position because I know that he will serve with distinction and skill. It is my hope, in view of the unanimous recommendation of this nomination by the Senate Committee on Finance, that the entire membership of the Senate will vote in approval of this nomination.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the committee, for yielding.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I thank my distinguished friend from Mississippi for those very generous words about Mr. Baker.

I yield such time as the majority leader, the Senator from Kansas, may want.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I congratulate the Finance Committee and its chairman, BOB PACKWOOD for moving so promptly to report the President's nomination of James Baker to be Secretary of the Treasury, replacing Don Regan, who will be moving to the White House as Chief of Staff. I am confident the Senate will follow suit, because swift action on Jim Baker's nomination is important—not just because of the outstanding qualifications both he and Don Regan will bring to their new jobs, but because it is vital that the President get his team in order and working at top strength as soon as possible. The ambitious agenda President Reagan outlined in his second inaugural address demands the immediate attention of Jim Baker at the Treasury Department, so that he can bring to bear on that agenda the exceptional skills he has demonstrated at the White House over the past 4 years.

A DISTINGUISHED RECORD

Those of us who have worked with Jim Baker, particularly in advancing President Reagan's economic program, have no doubt that he is eminently qualified to serve as Secretary of the Treasury. Jim has been closely involved in the formulation and implementation of the President's tax and budget policies, and he has proven extremely effective in working with us in Congress. The importance of that skill should not be underestimated, given the President's ambitious economic agenda. Major spending cuts to reduce the deficit are our top priority, and no doubt Jim Baker will continue to focus primarily on that goal as he moves into the role of chief economic officer of the administration. But tax reform, constitutional reform of our fiscal policy, and maintaining good economic relations around the globe also are important to President Reagan, and will demand a firm guiding hand at Treasury.

Jim Baker's experience is by no means confined to the White House. He has served as Under Secretary of Commerce under President Ford, and he has been active in politics for many years—with considerable success, I might add. He has had a distinguished legal career, and he has served on the boards of many major companies. But most important of all, he knows us and he knows President Reagan, and he has won the confidence of those who govern from both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue. He will be able to get the job done that must be done on the economic front.

SENSE OF URGENCY

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will approve the nomination of James Baker to be Secretary of the Treasury without delay. The sooner we have all the players in place, the sooner we can complete legislative action to reduce the budget deficit. The work we have done in Senate discussions so far, with the cooperation of the administration, should enable us to pass a major spending reduction, "freeze plus" package that will secure and consolidate the tremendous economic gains of the past 4 years. Inflation subdued, tax rates controlled, regulation reduced, the growth of spending restrained—all of these achievements have made our citizens' restrained—all of these achievements have made our citizens' economic future look much brighter than anyone could have imagined 4 years ago. Anyone, that is, except Ronald Reagan, who led the way to economic recovery with the help of able lieutenants like Jim Baker and Don Regan. But we cannot relax now, with the challenge of the deficit still before us. Time is wasting, and the sooner we have Messrs. Baker and Regan in their new posts, the sooner we can get the job done.

Mr. President, I share the views just expressed by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi. Having worked closely with Jim Baker over the years and knowing of his willingness to compromise, his integrity and his dedication, I think it is fortunate that his nomination is before the Senate this afternoon. It is also maybe symbolic in a sense; this will be the first record vote this session. It is a very important nomination, and I am very pleased to support it. We will have a lot of work to do over the next few weeks and months dealing with the Treasury Secretary, dealing with Don Regan, who will move from Treasury to the White House, dealing with various members of the Cabinet, the President, and Members on both sides as we continue our work on deficit reduction. I am convinced that we can rely on the constructive assistance from the distinguished nominee, James Baker, and I hope and believe that we will unanimously approve his nomination this afternoon.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I might tell the majority leader we also sent out of committee today Mr. Darman to be Deputy Secretary and Mr. Pearlman to be Assistant Secretary. I hope we can have those on the floor before too long.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask that the time be charged equally to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I yield such time as the Senator from Texas may desire.

Mr. BENTSEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. President, I wish to join my colleagues in recommending speedy confirmation of Jim Baker's nomination by the Senate.

The country may be at a crossroads in Federal tax policy today. Opinion polls show that the public favors the concept of a lower-rate, broader-based tax, and we may be at the point of undertaking a wholesale reappraisal of the many deductions, credits, and preferences in the Tax Code.

But the polls also show that the public wants to preserve deductions for such things as charitable contributions and mortgage interest. And most of the special provisions in our tax laws are based on policies that similarly have strong support—such as encouraging research and development or encouraging oil exploration.

I think Jim Baker is a good choice to steer us down the narrow path between these inconsistent positions. Whether or not the President decides to give a priority to tax reform on his agenda, I do not doubt that many of the special deductions, credits, and preferences in the Tax Code will be reexamined.

Mr. President, Jim Baker comes from a family that has given our State of Texas generations of leadership. He has carried on in that tradition. He, of course, has superlative credentials—from an excellent education, to military service, to law firm partnership. And he has an impeccable reputation for integrity. Moreover, I think he will be able to appreciate the effect of the tax laws on business and personal decisions and on the economy. As former Treasury Secretary and fellow Texan John Connelly pointed out recently, "He knows that lower interest rates are good for the country."

Mr. President, in his hearings before the Finance Committee last week, Jim Baker demonstrated a solid grasp of the complicated issues that he will deal with. I think the committee also demonstrated to him the diversity of opinion that he will have to deal with on the Hill. I urge my colleagues to approve his nomination.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and ask unanimous consent that the time be charged equally to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I yield such time as he may consume to the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. I thank my distinguished friend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, a President's second term often brings a new team. The nomination of a key part of President Reagan's new team, Mr. James Baker, is before us today. As White House Chief of Staff, Mr. Baker was a key member of the President's first term team as well. In that very difficult and demanding post, Mr. Baker generally was given high marks for efficiency and effectiveness. He acquired a reputation for pragmatism and the ability to strike a compromise that could break policy or some kind of legislative logjams. These are abilities that will serve him well in his new post as Secretary of the Treasury.

From the early days of the Republic, the Treasury post has been a key part of the economic life of the country. The Treasury's responsibilities range from shaping tax policy to helping maintain the stability of the international financial system.

In many ways, Mr. Baker enters the Treasury post in favorable circumstances. He is the choice of an immensely popular President with whom he has worked closely for 4 years. The economy has grown rapidly for 2 years and the relatively strong performance in the last 3 months has quieted at least for the moment fears of a near-term recession. He has the opportunity to be remembered as a Secretary of the Treasury who helped lay a solid base for long-term prosperity.

However, Mr. President, the new Secretary of the Treasury also will have to face some serious challenges—challenges that could determine the industrial and financial health of the United States for years to come. Mr. Baker will have to face the problem of a severely overvalued dollar. Last year's estimated trade deficit of $125 billion almost doubled the all-time record trade deficit of a year before. Recently, Ambassador Brock estimated that the 1985 trade deficit could be 25-percent higher still. There is more than one cause of the trade deficit, but the dollar is a major factor. The value of the dollar has risen so high that manufacturing industries in particular are placed in a position of severe competitive disadvantage in both overseas and domestic markets.

Mr. Baker also faces an international financial system still burdened by hundreds of billions of dollars of loans to developing countries. Many American banks are involved in those loans—and the larger the bank the more deeply it is likely to have been involved. In addition to foreign loans, domestic banks are struggling with the uncertain path of further deregulation and the prospect of loan defaults in the energy and agricultural sectors.

As a leading economic figure in the administration, Mr. Baker will have to wrestle with the difficult problem of deficit reduction. What finally happens to deficit reduction this year, will, in some part, be influenced by Mr. Baker's views on the economic outlook and where spending cuts should be made.

Mr. Baker also has a rare opportunity to play a major role in simplifying the Tax Code. The American public clearly wants a tax code that is simple, fair, and supportive of economic growth. More than anyone except the President himself, Mr. Baker can contribute to giving us a revised tax system with these characteristics.

Mr. President, the future offers Mr. Baker both many challenges and opportunities. His choices can help us move forward toward a path of long-term growth or downward toward the road of debt and deficits. He brings many skills to his new office. He will need them all.

I wish Mr. Baker well in his new post, because, in saying that, I am wishing our Nation well.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of President Reagan's nomination of James A. Baker III, to the Office of Secretary of the Treasury.

The Treasury Secretary holds a position of great importance in our system of government. This office is fifth in the line of succession to the Presidency. As the chief adviser and analyst on economic and monetary matters to the President, the Treasury Secretary performs a vital function in formulating the financial policies of our country.

Mr. President, in my estimation, Jim Baker is eminently qualified to serve as Secretary of the Treasury. He is a man of the utmost integrity, and his remarkable energy and acumen have earned him the respect of those persons with whom he has worked and consulted. For the past 4 years, Mr. Baker has served ably as Chief of Staff and Assistant to President Reagan, establishing an impressive record as an excellent manager and keen legislative strategist.

His formidable negotiation skills and a capacity for hard work helped to secure passage in 1981 of President Reagan's landmark tax cut and spending reduction legislation. This legislation is responsible in large measure for the economic recovery our country is enjoying today. Moreover, Mr. Baker can list among his credits the important role he played in the successful legislative effort to place the Social Security Retirement Program on a sound financial footing, thereby easing the concerns of millions of our senior citizens whose economic survival depends on their Social Security benefits.

Mr. Baker's many other accomplishments while working at the White House are too numerous to recite here. Suffice it to say that the experience gained as Chief of Staff and Assistant to the President has made him particularly well suited to serve in the position to which he has been nominated.

Mr. President, the fine record Mr. Baker has made for himself as Chief of Staff and Assistant to President Reagan is but part and parcel of a distinguished professional career. After graduating from Princeton University in 1952, Mr. Baker served his country proudly as a lieutenant in the U.S. Marine Corps. Subsequent to his military service, he attended the University of Texas School of Law, graduating with honors in 1957. He then joined the law firm of Andrews, Kurth, Campbell & Jones in his native Houston, TX, where he practiced law for 23 years, and earned a reputation as a superb corporate lawyer. From August 1975 to May 1976, Mr. Baker served as Under Secretary of Commerce. Mr. Baker's strong sense of civic responsibility is evidenced by his active involvement in numerous public service projects, including the Texas Children's Hospital and M.D. Anderson Hospital and Tumor Institute.

Mr. President, Jim Baker is a man of exemplary character whose work experience and education have prepared him well to meet successfully the enormous responsibilities of the Office of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have enjoyed working closely with Jim Baker in his role as Chief of White House Staff and Assistant to the President, and I look forward to working with him in the future in his new capacity as Secretary of the U.S. Department of the Treasury.

I strongly support the nomination of Mr. Baker to this post. If confirmed by the Senate, as I expect he will be by an overwhelming vote, I have every confidence that he will perform with exceptional skill and diligence the new duties and public trust reposed in him.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, today I rise to express my support for the nomination of James A. Baker III to be Secretary of the Treasury.

The announcement that Jim Baker and Don Regan would trade positions caught me—and virtually everyone else—by surprise. After the initial surprise wore off, I quickly concluded as did everyone else I spoke with that Jim Baker would make an excellent Secretary of the Treasury—especially if his past service as the President's chief of staff is any indication, which I believe it is.

During the past 4 years as chief of staff, Jim Baker has served the President and the country with extraordinary skill. He has demonstrated an exceptional ability to deal with a broad range of substantive, legislative, and political issues and achieve tangible results for the President. As the primary strategist for the 1981 tax and budget cuts, Jim Baker played a vital role in President Reagan's successful effort to reverse the trend of increased Government involvement in our economy. As the chief of staff, his efforts were Herculean and his accomplishments substantial.

I am confident that he will be a strong and effective Secretary of the Treasury. While the range of issues may not be as broad, the importance of the issues he will face during the President's second term cannot be underestimated. As the administration's economic spokesman, he will be the point person for deficit reduction, tax simplification, and international debt problems. The skills he demonstrated so ably as chief of staff will serve him well in dealing with Congress, foreign governments, and the American people on these issues.

I am confident that Jim Baker will serve the President and country well as Secretary of the Treasury. I congratulate him on his selection, look forward to working with him in his new position, and hope he stays in his new position for the entire second term.

Mr. HART. Mr. President, by nominating James Baker the President has chosen a Treasury Secretary known for his competence, his relative pragmatism, his political acumen, and his ability to get things done.

There are many things that need urgently to be done.

The departing Secretary, Donald T. Regan, leaves with his most important monument designed but as yet not built. That is the program for tax simplification and reform, prepared by the Treasury Department over the past year at the direction of the President, and presented to the public in November 1984.

The Treasury's proposal is—let us say frankly and without partisanship—a landmark work. It builds on the initiative of Senator BRADLEY in designing a broad-based, simplified progressive tax structure. It preserves the progressive, income-based character of our tax system. It would restore the universality and fairness required to make such a system work. It rejects suggestions to pile new tax burdens onto working men and women and onto the middle class, such as through a national sales or value-added tax.

The Treasury's proposal provides this body, the administration, and the new Treasury Secretary with an opportunity of singular importance.

We can rise above the clientele politics that so often characterizes our behavior—or we can sink beneath it.

We can act, for once, in the interest of the 80 percent of the Nation who want a simple, fair, progressive tax system—or we can act in the multiple interests of the organized minorities who do not.

We can give our system of revenue, and our system of government itself, new life with decisive action in favor of this plan—or we can administer its slow death by insisting that every interest be taken care of.

Responsibility to lead the way lies with the President, and the new field commander will be James Baker. Will he pursue tax simplification with the vigor that the public wants? Or will he let it die the death of a thousand cuts? The Nation will be watching.

Interest rates have fallen by over 2 points since the summer of 1984, and for a simple reason: easier monetary policy. It may be that we have exhausted the scope for still lower rates by this mechanism alone—that the Federal Reserve cannot safely risk still more easing of money all by itself. Yet, as every farmer, every small businessman, and every young couple seeking to buy a home knows, interest rates have not fallen enough.

Herein lies the second great challenge facing the Treasury Department: How to get interest rates down.

Deficit reduction must top any list of measures. Every serious analyst agrees that our deficits must be cut. But among this choir of voices, there has been one conspicuous exception: the U.S. Treasury Department. There, under the influence of some profoundly silly ideas, spokesmen have routinely waded into the tide of evidence on this point and ordered it to recede. "Deficits don't affect interest rates" they insist. Yet real interest rates and deficits have risen in tandem in the Reagan years.

The particular danger of this cavalier attitude toward revenues and deficits stems from the institutional role that the Treasury must play. The Treasury, to put it simply, must be the guardian of the public purse. If the Treasury is not concerned with the deficit, then who will be? We are only beginning to learn the consequences of allowing this role to be usurped by a radical theory.

A new Secretary provides an opportunity for a new departure. Secretary Baker should eschew the false optimism and phony scholarship of the supply-siders, just as Jim Baker resisted their worst incursions into high policy when he served as Chief of Staff at the White House. Perhaps, once in a while, he may even stroll over to his old offices and update his predecessor—even his boss—on the return of the Treasury Department to the fold of common sense.

The Treasury has another important role to play affecting interest rates in the area of international economic relations. These are properly reserved to the Treasury, and are not the sole province of the Federal Reserve. In this area the administration has not shown the imagination that the situation requires.

The urgent need of the world economy is for international leadership and coordinated action on two problems: to lower real interest rates around the world, and to resolve, rather than merely manage, the debt crisis in Latin America. On these issues—partly because of the scorn with which the Treasury view on budget deficits has been reviewed by our friends abroad—the Department has been ineffective. Perhaps here, too, with the authority that Mr. Baker brings to his job, we can hope for a change.

Finally, there is the conduct of monetary policy itself. For 4 years now, the Department of the Treasury has been embarrassingly wrong-headed on this subject. We have had 4 years of Fed-baiting, spurious criticism and scapegoating—while at the same time the Treasury supported the worst excesses of the tight money, high interest rate policy of the Federal Reserve.

We can hope for a return to reason on this score. Let the Federal Reserve be criticized when it is wrong. But let the administration also speak with one clear voice on monetary matters—and not one supportive voice in private and another carping, criticizing voice for the benefit of the public press.

Mr. President, James Baker has long sought a Cabinet level appointment. On a personal level, I am pleased he will be able to realize this goal. But with the unique qualities he is bringing to the Treasury Department, his selection as Secretary of the Treasury may augur well for the country. He has an enormous task before him—on tax reform, interest rates, and international economic policy as well. He has a well-earned reputation for his ability to get things done. His reputation on that point will certainly be tested in the months ahead. I intend to support his nomination.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I want to express my strong support for James Baker as nominee for Secretary of the Treasury. Jim Baker has had an extraordinary record of service in the past 4 years in the administration of President Reagan as chief of staff and assistant to the President. During his time at the White House, Jim Baker had the responsibility to develop and implement the President's legislative strategy. I believe he has discharged his duties with great skill and aplomb and he has proven himself to be just an exceptionally talented individual.

Jim Baker has approached the legislative branch in an open and fair-minded spirit. He has worked with most of my colleagues at various times and has developed a strong rapport with many Members of Congress. I believe that this will serve him well as he proceeds to deal with the very difficult issues ahead in the coming months and years. I have the highest regard for Jim Baker personally and I urge my colleagues to join me in unanimous support of this truly remarkable individual for the position of Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise to offer my words of support for our President's nomination of his trusted chief of staff to become the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Baker's experience in Washington and in working with so many members of the administration will serve him well as he undertakes his new duties. In the course of my discussions with Mr. Baker over the past 4 years, and in my capacity as a member of the Finance Committee which confirmed his nomination last week, I have found him to be sensitive to my concerns about the economic crisis now facing so many of the citizens of my State of Iowa.

I am confident that as he assumes his duties as chief advocate of the administration's economic policies that he will consider the need to address the farm crisis with immediate actions to implement the President's farm credit plan. It is my hope that Mr. Baker will make it a priority to encourage the freeze on Federal spending necessary to bring the budget deficits under control. Only then will there be the relief from the high interest rates and poor international exchange rates that have caused such havoc for our Nation's farmers.

I hope he will continue your predecessor's efforts to work closely with Chairman Volker of the Federal Reserve Board for a reduction in the interest rates. I am looking forward to working with Mr. Baker in the coming session as the Finance Committee considers the tax reform proposals now being proposed by the administration and Members of Congress. As we examine the various elements of each plan, I would expect his support for formulating a tax policy that will promote economic growth and productivity, with a sense of fairness and equity for all segments of our country.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I commend President Reagan for his excellent choice of James A. Baker III as Secretary of the Treasury. Knowing Jim Baker, and the excellent job he has done as the President's chief of staff, there is no question that he has the qualities and expertise necessary to meet the extremely challenging and taxing responsibilities which await him as Secretary of the Treasury. His outstanding record as chief of staff is sure to be reflected in his new capacity. I am extremely pleased to give Jim Baker my complete and unequivocal support as he assumes this most important position.

Jim Baker takes on this role at an extremely difficult and challenging time in this country's economic history. The present U.S. Tax Code is too complicated, it is unfair, and it retards economic growth. While the desire to reform taxes is probably as old as the tax structure itself, recently interest in this issue has greatly increased on the part of the American people.

Many individuals and businessmen from all economic strata believe strongly in, and are calling for, basic tax reform aimed at restoring simplicity and fairness to our system of taxation. This issue, together with the serious debt problem this country faces, will keep both Congress and the Treasury Department extremely busy in the coming years, and it is vital that we have an individual of the caliber of Jim Baker at the head of Treasury during this time.

I have had the distinct pleasure of working with, and getting to know Jim Baker on a personal level. I am very impressed with his abilities and dedication to the service of the American people. I am confident that he will continue to serve his country well as Secretary of the Treasury.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I am proud to rise in support of the nomination of James Baker as Secretary of the Treasury. He has served our President and this Nation well during the last 4 years in his capacity as the President's chief of staff, and I have the utmost confidence in his ability to efficiently and successfully run the Treasury Department.

Mr. Baker's credentials are outstanding and his experience in coordinating many of President Reagan's triumphs on Capitol Hill will be useful as he undertakes the arduous but necessary task of simplifying this country's Tax Code. In 1981, his contributions were crucial to the success of the tax-cut package and spending reductions which laid the foundation for our currently vibrant economy. He also helped to guide the Social Security package through the Halls of Congress which rescued the program and enabled millions of our elderly residents to live without the fear that one day that check, their sole source of income, would not be in the mail.

These are achievements of profound proportion and clearly demonstrate that his service has touched the lives of literally millions of Americans. I am very grateful to Mr. Baker for his contributions to this administration thus far, and eagerly anticipate his contributions and successes in the next 4 years. His desire and willingness to selflessly continue working as a public servant rather than opt for the less frazzled and higher paying jobs in the private sector is a reflection of this man's dedication to fair and decent principles.

I urge my colleagues to unanimously support the nomination of Mr. James Baker as Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I support the nomination of James Baker to be the Secretary of the Treasury. In the last 4 years, he has consistently demonstrated good humor, patience, and political wisdom in a most demanding job. These qualities will serve him well in his new position, and will permit him to continue to serve the President well, as he has since 1981.

I look forward to working with Treasury Secretary Baker in a number of areas. Certainly among the most important of these will be the enactment into law of fundamental and broad-based personal and corporate tax reform. I am encouraged that Mr. Baker has confirmed that such tax reform is a top priority of the administration, because I personally believe that we have an opportunity to carry out a policy change of historic significance in this area. Should Mr. Baker ever, in the press of affairs, lose sight of the importance of tax reform; or should his devotion to the subject flag, I will certainly be among those pressing it upon him again.

I wish Mr. Baker well in his new undertaking, although I am sure that if success comes to those who bring to their tasks intelligence, diligence, and perspective, then success will be his. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting his nomination.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am pleased to take this opportunity to strongly support James A. Baker for the position of Secretary of the Treasury. I believe President Reagan has made an excellent choice for I am convinced that Mr. Baker has the necessary qualifications to be Secretary of the Treasury. For the past 4 years Mr. Baker has served the President and the American people in a professional and dedicated manner as the chief of staff and assistant to the President, and I am confident that as Secretary of the Treasury he will continue to demonstrate his high degree of loyalty, integrity, and leadership.

When the Senate Finance Committee considered the nomination of Jim Baker, he responded in a highly satisfactory manner to a number of queries including the budget deficit, tax reform, trade deficit, the Federal Reserve, and interest rates. In his prepared statement, Mr. Baker said:

> I am particularly grateful for the personal relationships I have developed in the process. More generally, however, I have tried to help assure that we approach relations with the Legislative Branch in a constructive, open, and fair-minded spirit—and I have been gratified that this spirit has been consistently reciprocated. If confirmed by the Senate, I would hope and expect to continue to work with the Congress, and your committee, in the same constructive spirit.

I firmly believe Jim Baker will continue to work constructively with the Congress in his new position as Secretary of the Treasury.

During the 6 years that I been in the Senate, the Treasury Department has played an important role in helping to solve problems affecting the constituents of Minnesota and the Nation. During the several years that I have worked with Jim, I have found him to be helpful and cooperative. As he assumes his new responsibilities in the Treasury Department, I look forward to continuing our good working relationship in solving issues affecting Minnesota and the Nation.

There are, of course, many issues that arise periodically in my office that require discussion with the Treasury Department. A few of these current issues are: First, intergovernmental issues including limiting the deductibility of State and local taxes for Federal income tax purposes to the extent these taxes exceed 1 percent of adjusted gross income; second, the importance of solving the imputed interest problem quickly and in an uncomplicated fashion; third, the role of Treasury in solving the American farm problem; fourth, providing support for troubled basic industries—agriculture, forest products, mining, steel and transportation—which have not shared in the recent economic recovery; fifth, tax reform issues; and sixth, placing a dollar limitation on the amount of total tax free fringe benefits that an employer can provide an employee—with each employee permitted to select his benefits—and with a separate limitation for medical premium costs. The following is a more detailed discussion of the first two issues listed above:

INTERGOVERNMENTAL ISSUES AND DEDUCTIBILITY OF STATE AND LOCAL TAXES

Throughout the past 4 years, President Reagan has expressed his strong intention to return program responsibilities and the resources needed to fulfill them to State and local governments.

No matter how noteworthy, those goals have proven difficult to implement. In our haste to solve the budget dilemma and reform the Tax Code, we sometimes lose sight of the needs and problems at the State and local government level. We don't always take the time to think about the role of Government and the operation of the intergovernmental fiscal system.

As Jim Baker takes over at Treasury, he has a golden opportunity to signal State and local governments that the President is still serious about making the intergovernmental system work.

The issue of State and local tax deductibility is a good example. This deduction helps protect the ability of State and local governments to raise revenue and assume program responsibility. It also helps cushion the effect of fiscal disparities between States—disparities which result from differing capacities to raise revenue. For example, some States have a better capacity to generate revenue from natural resources, manufacturing, or financial transactions, and in the process keep individual income tax rates low. Some States have to raise more revenue because they are highly urbanized or carry a larger-than-average percentage of poor Americans.

Instead of outright repeal or selective modification, the Treasury should be looking at alternatives which preserve the intergovernmental benefits of State and local tax deductibility.

I have suggested to Mr. Baker that he look at an alternative to outright repeal which I plan to introduce soon. It would allow a taxpayer to deduct his or her State and local taxes exceeding 1 percent of adjusted gross income. Everything below 1 percent AGI would be nondeductible.

I also hope Jim Baker will take a look at the ongoing Treasury Department study of the intergovernmental fiscal system. The intergovernmental community has raised serious concerns about approaches Treasury is taking to project future fiscal outlooks.

If he works closely with State and local officials on these and other issues, it will make it far easier for those of us charged with implementing the President's New Federalism proposals to see them become reality.

IMPUTED INTEREST ISSUE

Another issue that the Treasury Department must look at soon is the imputed interest problem. Most of you will recall that the imputed interest provisions enacted as part of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, became the subject of intense debate at the very end of the 98th Congress. We enacted temporary rules to solve the problem, but they expire on July 1, 1985. We must act before July 1 to provide a permanent solution so that homeowners, farmers, and small businessmen, among others, can be certain of the law when contemplating a transaction utilizing seller financing.

The Internal Revenue Code has long contained rules for determining if the contracts in such transactions had properly distinguished between principal and interest and for reallocating the payments if they had not. The IRS is required to scrutinize debt instruments for below-market interest rates giving rise to amounts of "unstated interest" and, when found, to "impute" an amount of interest based on market rates. The amount of interest that each payment would have contained if it had been computed at market rates is the "imputed interest" in that payment, and the rate of the payment is allocated to principal.

The IRS has usually used its power to define unstated interest conservatively. For example, the pre-Deficit Reduction Act IRS rules for installment sales set the "market" rate used to test for unstated interest at only 9 percent sample interest, which is below the current actual market rate. This leaves buyers and sellers considerable room to bargain.

Essentially, then, the crux of the problem is that the 1984 act mandated to the Treasury Department that they could no longer use conservative figures for unstated interest. The result is that parties have lost flexibility to bargain, and at times of high interest rates this bargaining is essential to sell homes, farms, and small businesses.

In order to solve this problem, I have introduced legislation, S. 251, which is a simple effective solution. I look forward to working with the Treasury Department, and Secretary Baker in an effort to resolve this issue before the temporary rules expire.

The position of Secretary of the Treasury is an extremely important Cabinet post. Jim Baker has the qualifications for that post and has my unqualified support.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, James Baker III is before the Senate for confirmation. I should like to state that I have many things in common with the distinguished nominee. First, he has eight children, I have eight children; he is an avid hunter, and I enjoy nothing more than a good day of hunting; he enjoys tennis, and so do I; he is a lawyer, and so am I but neither of us have practiced for quite some time. I think everybody would conclude that because of those similarities he will obviously make a magnificent Secretary of the Treasury.

However, on a serious note, Mr. President, I am very pleased that James Baker III has been nominated to be Secretary of the Treasury. If I have any misgivings, he should know that it is only because I have worked closely with him for 4 years. I was very pleased with that working relationship. I have nothing but compliments for him and the splendid way that he handled a most difficult job as he helped our President at his right hand for 4 years. Because he did such a splendid job, obviously it is with reluctance that I watch him leave that position. I have the greatest confidence in the President's selection of the person to succeed him, and in all honesty I am convinced that, while Jim Baker III says he wants to leave the job he has because he needs a bit of relief, I am in complete accord, but I know he will have another very difficult job; the job of the Secretary of the Treasury. Tax simplification, deficit reduction, economic adviser to the President, trade matters, deregulation and regulation of the financial institutions are a sufficient recipe in terms of activities for any one human being. He will do them well. It is my pleasure to support him and I do so with absolutely no reluctance whatsoever. My congratulations to the President for having selected him.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was confirmed.

Mr. SIMPSON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified that the Senate has given its consent to this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I announce that there will be no more rollcall votes today. That should certainly clear the Chamber so we can get on with our legislative activity.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I inquire of the minority leader if he is ready to proceed to the legal counsel resolution and the material with regard to the Executive Calendar.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this side is ready to proceed to the consideration of the resolution to which the distinguished acting Republican leader has alluded.

AUTHORIZATION TO PROCEED

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 52) to authorize production of documents and deposition testimony by Senator JESSE HELMS and representation by the Senate Legal Counsel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, Senator HELMS has received a deposition subpoena issued on behalf of the plaintiff in the case of The Alan Guttmacher Institute v. M. Peter McPherson, et al., Civil Action No. 83-4461-CSH, which is pending in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York. The plaintiff is challenging a decision by the Agency for International Development not to renew a grant for publication of a journal entitled "International Family Planning Perspectives." The subpoena calls for testimony by Senator HELMS and for the production of documents concerning his communications with AID officials about population or family planning publications funded by AID.

The resolution would authorize Senator HELMS to produce documents and to testify about nonprivileged matters which may be relevant to this lawsuit, and would also authorize the Senate legal counsel to represent Senator HELMS in this proceeding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 52) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 52

Whereas, the case of The Alan Guttmacher Institute v. M. Peter McPherson, et al., Civil Action No. 83-4461-CSH, is pending in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York;

Whereas, counsel for the plaintiff has served a subpoena for the production of documents and taking of testimony at a deposition upon Senator Jesse Helms, concerning communications from 1980 to the present, in his official capacity as a United States Senator, relating to certain grant funding by the Agency for International Development;

Whereas, title VII of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, Public Law 95-521 ("the Act"), establishes the Office of Senate Legal Counsel and provides that the Senate may direct its Counsel to represent the Senate, its committees, Members, officers, or employees;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that testimony of a Member of the Senate is needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That pursuant to section 704(a)(2) of the Act, the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to represent Senator Jesse Helms in connection with his testimony in the case of The Alan Guttmacher Institute v. M. Peter McPherson, et al., Civil Action No. 83-4461-CSH.

SEC. 2. That Senator Jesse Helms is authorized to produce documents and testify at a deposition in the case of The Alan Guttmacher Institute v. M. Peter McPherson, et al., Civil Action No. 83-4461-CSH, except concerning matters that he and the Senate Legal Counsel or his representative determine are privileged from disclosure.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period of morning business for Senators to speak not more than 5 minutes and not to exceed 30 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BEHIND THE SCENES IN HEALTH CARE

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, these are times of unprecedented change and challenge in health care. Stimulated by modifications which have been made in the Medicare system, hospitals and other health care providers are undergoing significant changes in how they treat patients and continue to provide the highest quality care possible.

Overall, we are seeing a shift toward incentives which reward efficiency and efforts to keep people well. These changes are long past due. In 1984, health care cost Americans an estimated $390 billion, or about 11 percent of all the money spent on goods and services in this country. It's hard to find anyone these days who isn't concerned about the rising cost of health care and the impact it is having on both family and governmental budgets.

That's why it's encouraging to note the fact that changes being made in Medicare—and the health-care system in general—appear to be working. Last year, the cost of hospital care in the United States rose only 3.5 percent, well below the kind of double-digit increases we have experienced in recent years.

In the first 3 months of 1984, total hospitalization of Medicare patients in Minnesota declined 22.5 percent. That represents a significant savings for both Medicare patients and for the Medicare Program as a whole.

Whenever significant change like this occurs, it's important to recognize the crucial role played by the people who are on the front lines—actually working every day to carry out that change.

Among those most responsible for implementing the dramatic changes we see taking place in health care today are the millions of dedicated individuals who work in hospitals. From administrators to nurses on the wards, and from dietitians to housekeepers, hospital employees across the country are making a significant contribution to continuing our tradition of providing high quality care, but at a more affordable price.

One of those individuals is Cecelia Razook who has worked for the past 50 years at what are now United Hospitals in St. Paul. Cecelia has worked most of her 50 years in the hospital's housekeeping department. She has also been active as an executive board member and steward of her union local and is a member of the St. Paul Trades & Labor Assembly.

Even more impressive than her length of service, however, is the fact that—over the past 50 years—Cecelia has never taken a day of sick leave.

Because of the contributions which she has made, and because of her outstanding commitment to providing high quality health care, I ask unanimous consent that the text of a recent article on Cecelia Razook from the Saint Paul Pioneer Press be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text of the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

50 PERFECT YEARS JUST ALL IN A DAY'S WORK FOR CECELIA RAZOOK

(By Dorothy Lewis)

Gold balloons will fill the lobby at United Hospitals today and a small army of doctors, nurses, dietitians, bookkeepers and maintenance workers will wear "Cecelia Razook" buttons on their lapels.

A tea, reception and dinner are scheduled as part of the festivities.

Why the big celebration? And who is Cecelia Razook?

Ask any of the 2,800 workers at the hospital and they will point out a rather short gray-haired woman who is usually seen plumping pillows, smoothing sheets or, with broom and dustpan, tidying up the third floor.

HONORS TODAY

Razook, who noted her 50th year with the hospital Sunday, is being honored today for her 50 years of service and for setting the unlikely record of never having taken a sick day in all of that time.

So Razook will be something of a "queen for a day" today, even riding to and from work in a limousine.

"How about that?" She asked, flashing a broad smile.

How she happened to set the half-century record of perfect attendance reflects partly her affinity for a work ethic, but it also points to a remarkable health record and an ability to save for a rainy day.

JUST HAD COLDS

"A friend of mine used to take every sick day she had coming as she earned it," Razook said. "Then when she was really ill and needed the time, she didn't have it.

"Besides, I was never that sick," she added. "And I don't believe in taking time off for nothing."

Throughout her years of service, Razook has only had an occasional light cold. Even as a child, she escaped all of the usual childhood diseases: measles, mumps and the like.

"I am lucky to have had such good health," she said, "but I also take care of myself and don't neglect my health. Some people are out there in shorts, running, the minute the sun shines. That's not for me. That's a quick way to get a bad cold or pneumonia."

Razook has been taking care of herself since her early teens.

Born in Rugby, N.D., Razook was 3 when her mother died; her father died three years later. Razook lived with an older brother and sister until she was 14, when she moved to St. Paul. She finished school at Mechanic Arts High School and at 16, while attending Rasmussen Business College, she began working at the former Charles T. Miller Hospital.

"I had planned to finish business school," she said, "but we were in the Depression and jobs were very hard to find. I liked hospital work. I liked meeting patients, doing things for them.

"You see them come in so sick, then as they improve, their spirits rise and they look so changed. It's really satisfying to watch that happen."

So Razook stayed on.

For years, she lived with her sister, who was active in the International Ladies Garment Workers' Union local. She became interested in the labor movement and, in 1946, helped organize fellow workers at Miller into the Hospital & Nursing Home Employees Union local 113. She has been an executive board member and steward of the local for more than 30 years, and is a member of the St. Paul Trades & Labor Assembly.

During World War II when a shortage of male workers developed, Razook became an elevator operator at the hospital. She remained on that job until the elevators were switched to automatic controls, then she returned to housekeeping.

Until her sister died in the late 1970s, Razook and her sister planned their vacations together and traveled extensively.

"We were in almost every state in the union," she said. "But I still have to see Hawaii and Alaska."

It was during her travels years ago that she decided to remain single. "I saw so many couples arguing, not getting along. I thought, 'That isn't for me.' "

Razook appreciates her independence.

"I like it this way," she said. "I can do as I please. That's how I've always liked to live."

If she had her life to live over, Razook admits she probably would not have remained with the hospital this long.

"I'm sure I would have changed jobs in my earlier years," she said. "I don't think of it as a rut, but when you say you've worked at one place 50 years, well, you wonder. I'm really not the type to let the grass grow under my feet.". And she is not thinking of retiring.

"This is not a retirement party, just a 50-year anniversary," she said. "As long as I have my health, and enjoy my work, why retire?"

ARTS IN THE TWIN CITIES

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, last week the Kennedy Center announced the creation of the new American National Theater. This ambitious project is designed not only to offer fine locally produced shows, but also to bring together in our Nation's Capital the best offerings of regional theaters across the country. This is a welcome acknowledgment of the importance of regional theater to the national arts community.

As a resident of Minneapolis-St. Paul I have been privileged to live in one of the Nation's most dynamic and innovative cultural centers. Walk around the Twin Cities and you seem continually to be bumping into theaters.

Minnesota has a well deserved reputation for being progressive: We treasure tradition, but we also revel in breaking with it. That attitude extends to our theaters, where traditional fare is mixed with adventurous new approaches that both challenge and entertain.

Thanks to a loyal community generous with their moral and financial support, groups providing theater, music, dance, and other performing arts have flourished in the Twin Cities. Newsweek magazine calls it "an artistic boom that has turned Minneapolis-St. Paul into a major U.S. cultural center.

That quote come from an article entitled "Adventures in the Twin Cities" (Jan. 28, 1985), concerning the latest addition to the area's cultural life: the new Ordway Music Theatre in St. Paul.

The Ordway was designed by Benjamin Thompson, who also designed the renovated Old Post Office here in Washington, and the theater is a similar blend of traditional and contemporary styles. The surroundings are warm and comfortable, while also alive with light and color. The complex provides two new theaters; it also provides a home for the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra and for the Minnesota Opera, known for its adventurous approaches to staging.

Mr. President, for our national arts community to remain a dynamic creative force, it has to depend on the fresh infusions of talent and ideas that come from regional and local organizations. The new Ordway Music Theatre will doubtless provide another springboard for that creative energy, proving an asset to Minnesotans and all who appreciate the performing arts.

I ask unanimous consent that the Newsweek article, "Adventures in the Twin Cities," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADVENTURES IN THE TWIN CITIES

The sad songs go on: hard times in the arts, orchestras and opera companies feeling the pinch, and, just last week, reports of a possible slash in funding for the National Endowment for the Arts. None of this seems to have diminished the cultural edifice complex. In the last five years no fewer than 12 new performance centers have been completed in the United States and Canada, ranging in size from San Francisco's Louise M. Davies Symphony Hall (3,063 seats) to the Pikes Peak Center (1,836 seats) at Colorado Springs. This month St. Paul's $45 million Ordway Music Theatre joined the list. At 1,815 seats it's the smallest of the new halls, and also one of the nicest.

A three-night opening bash included a sublime Leontyne Price recital and two performances by the local organizations that will occupy the Ordway: a Mozart program by the Saint Paul Chamber Orchestra, conducted by its music director Pinchas Zukerman, and the American premiere of Swedish composer Lars Johan Werle's "Animalen" by the Minnesota opera. If neither of these latter events did much to relive the chill of a Minnesota January, the hall itself more than made amends.

The clichés of contemporary music-hall design are stony massiveness and ceilings festooned with enough high-tech acoustical gadgetry for a fleet of spaceships. Neither, praise be, held any charm for Ordway's architect, the locally born Benjamin Thompson, whose previous masterworks include the renovations of Boston's Faneuil Hall, Marketplace and Washington's Old Post Office. Ordway was planned, says Thompson, as a "living room for the city." It is set among several handsomely restored buildings that face a downtown park. The interior is alive with color. The auditorium space is divided by wide center aisles—a vast convenience compared with the nuisance of straight-across "continental seating," in which access to a centrally located seat means pushing past as many as 40 pairs of knees. The lobby lighting is generous enough to set all of downtown St. Paul aglow. A second, more intimate theater with 315 seats is ideal for experimental events. Although acoustician R. Lawrence Kirkegaard has allowed for further "tuning" of the main hall with a series of adjustable sound reflectors, the sounds of opening week were clear, warm-hued and well diffused through the house.

ENTERPRISING

The Ordway (whose building was sparked by a $14.4 million donation from 3M heiress Sally Ordway Irvine and her family) is but the latest sign of an artistic boom that has turned Minneapolis-St. Paul into a major U.S. cultural center. A thread of experimentation has always run through the artistic life of the region. The conductors of the 81-year-old Minnesota (formerly Minneapolis) Orchestra have included such iconoclasts as the fiery Dimitri Mitropoulos and Stanislaw Skrowaczewski. The Walker Art Center has long won national attention for its sponsorship of progressive artists and composers. In the last two decades several other enterprising institutions have appeared: the celebrated Guthrie Theater and the Minnesota Opera (formerly known as Center Opera), both founded in 1963, and the 16-year-old Saint Paul Chamber Orchestra. Somewhat more sleek and respectable now under Zukerman's foursquare direction, the Chamber Orchestra made a national reputation as a champion of new music during the eight-year tenure (1972-80) of Dennis Russell Davies.

Above all, it has been the Minnesota Opera that has earned the Twin Cities a reputation for all-out adventure—both for its receptiveness to contemporary repertory and for its innovative staging, which has broken completely with the static look of old-fashioned opera. In such works as "Postcard from Morocco" by Minneapolis resident Dominick Argento and "Transformations" by Conrad Susa, the company ardently explored the idea that a night of contemporary opera just might be fun.

ELEMENTAL SCORE

Given that tradition, the choice of "Animalen" to inaugurate the company's first permanent home seemed curiously cautious. The libretto, by filmmaker Tage Danielsson, tells a simplistic fable. An American boy loves a Russian girl. The diplomats of both nations try to separate them. Love, aided by a deputation from the animal world, conquers all, to an elemental score by sometime movie composer Werle. Billed as the first Swedish opera staged in the United States,

"Animalen" goes a long way to answer questions about why there haven't been more.

At the very least, the company showed off its long-touted brilliance of production and the exceptional leadership of principal conductor Philip Brunelle. There was no question, however, that the Ordway itself was the star of the occasion. "St. Paul has been known as a place where people get up early and go to bed early," say five-term Mayor George Latimer, an enthusiastic music lover. Now, with its pretty new hall full of activity most nights, St. Paulites may find good reason to change those hours.

AMBASSADOR LEON WEIL STRESSES IMPORTANCE OF PRIVATE SECTOR IN NEPAL

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, earlier this month I had the opportunity to meet personally with the American Ambassador to Nepal, Mr. Leon J. Weil.

A successful businessman himself, Ambassador Weil has made encouragement of private entrepreneurship in Nepal one of his highest priorities. Based on my discussions with Nepalese officials and businessmen, this approach to economic growth and development is receiving a warm reception among leading figures in Nepal.

Because the phenomenon of reliance on the private sector as the principal engine of economic development needs to be encouraged, Ambassador Weil should be commended for his work in that direction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a Nepalese press article concerning Ambassador Weil be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INCREASED AWARENESS OF PRIVATE SECTOR'S IMPORTANCE LAUDED

The ambassador of the United States of America, Leon J. Weil, has commended the growth of awareness in Nepal of the critical importance of the private sector in generating wealth and capital for productive economic growth.

Addressing a talk programme held by the Federation of Nepali Chambers of Commerce and Industry in Kathmandu Thurday afternoon, Mr. Weil observed the resources and initiative of the private sector are instrumental in generating real growth.

Referring to his business background marked by 34 years of experience in the investment business in New York City, the U.S. envoy referred to the opening of the new securities exchange market in Nepal some time ago.

This, remarked Mr. Weil, was the concrete example of Nepal's commitment to increasing the role of the private sector in the growth of the nation's economy.

Mr. Weil said things are beginning to move in Nepal and I for one am excited by what I see to be real opportunities waiting to be developed.

When we talk about Nepal America economic relations as they exist today, there is no escaping the fact that trade and investment are at a very low level, he said adding this is partly due to various inescapable constraints, primarily geographical and partly due to such factors as the previous lack of a sufficient infrastructure, communication, transportation, and the like to support meaningful industrial growth or a dynamic international trade.

Stating that things have changed over the past several years and they continue to change, the American ambassador said partially supported by assistance from my own government and others, Nepal has made great strides in developing the kind of modern economic environment in which trade and investment can begin to prosper.

Educational opportunities have increased tremendously, creating an ever increasing pool of educated, skilled labour which is so essential to economic growth, Mr. Weil said and added the road network that has and is being built is a tremendous asset and Nepal is now linked to the outside world by efficient and speedy satellite communications.

On foreign investment the U.S. envoy remarked, to successfully attract foreign investment factors such as a clearly announced schedule of tax waivers for the starting up period, confidence among potential investors that the ground rules will not be changed abruptly from year to year, the cutting of bureacratic red tape and streamlining of administrative procedures must be present.

What is required is an aggressive positive campaign on the part of Nepal to attract investment in those areas of the economy in which you yourselves perceived the maximum, optimum advantage to Nepal's economy in terms of generating employment, use of domestic resources, growth of exports, meaningful import substitution or whatever, observed Mr. Weil.

On trade, the American ambassador noted though the level of our bilateral trade is low, it is growing.

Under the Generalised System of Preferences the U.S. government is encouraging increased exports from Nepal to the U.S., he said, remarking, recently we have seen a growth in the garment industry in this country with a significant amount being targeted to the American market.

An additional area where we can look forward with some confidence to increased Nepal America economic ties is in the participation of American electronic and engineering firms in the development of your vast hydro electric potential, Mr. Weil remarked.

Mr. Weil said we recognize the importance of the proposed hydro electric projects to the future of Nepal and we encourage their development.

The FNCCI chairman Pashupati Giri speaking on the occasion said Nepal can benefit from the scientific and technological experience of the U.S.

Mr. Giri underlined the need to promote the U.S. Nepal joint venture in industry in this country.

JESSE CARR

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, earlier this month I lost a long-time friend with the death of Jesse Carr, secretary-treasurer of the Alaska Teamsters and director of the Western Conference of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters.

Jesse's indefatigable work on the Alaska pipeline labor contract resulted in an agreement that benefited not only the Teamsters but every individual who worked in the pipeline. Those benefits live on—they live on in the form of the pension fund checks, the medical, legal and recreational services, and buildings that arose under Jesse's guidance.

Jesse Carr knew that the best way to have a friend was to be one. I and many Alaskans mourn the loss of our good friend.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following articles and editorials be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JESSE CARR DIES—FRIENDS, ASSOCIATES LAUD UNION LEADER'S DEDICATION

(By Annette Taylor)

Jesse Carr, who built Teamsters Local 959 in the 1970's into the most powerful local in the nation, died Thursday night in Palm Springs, Calif., Teamsters officials in Seattle confirmed this morning.

"Jesse was a good friend who worked to preserve amiable relations between labor and management," Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens said today. "He'll long be remembered for his work on the pipeline.

"More than any other person, he built the Teamsters up from a small local to the most powerful union in the state," said state labor commissioner Jim Robison. "His objective was always service to the member."

Carr, secretary-treasurer of the Alaska local for 28 years, also served as head of the 450,000 member Western Conference of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and as one of 16 vice presidents of the 1.8 million member labor union. He was appointed to the top union slots in February and June 1984, respectively.

Carr, 59, rose to national prominence during construction of the $9 billion trans-Alaska pipeline when Local 959 swelled from 300 members a decade earlier to 28,000 members. To many at that time, Carr was considered the most powerful man in the state.

During that time, the union and Carr's power became the subject of several local and national news stories, many of which detailed alleged crime and corruption—charges Carr vehemently denied.

Earlier, in the late 1960s, Carr also generated headlines after being indicted on federal charges including extortion and embezzlement. He was aquitted of some and the others eventually were dropped.

In an interview earlier this year, Carr recalled those days as among his most trying and disappointing because, he said, he had been accused by friends.

Although feared by some, many others considered Carr a likeable, fair and honest man with an appealing manner of a straight-talking, friendly truck driver who made good.

A Teamster since 1946, Carr came to Alaska from San Bernardino, Calif., in 1951 and became business agent and organizer for Local 959 in 1953. The last time he drove a truck for a living was in 1952.

In 1957, Carr merged five Alaska locals into one. Under his leadership, the local developed what was nationally recognized as the best pay and benefits package in the nation. Local 959 also was one of the first locals in the country to develop full dental and prepaid legal programs for its members.

Carr was born and raised in Ontario, Calif. He served with the U.S. Marines in the Pacific Theatre in World War II.

He is survived by Helen, his wife of 37 years.

JESSE L. CARR

The death of Jesse L. Carr in Palm Springs last night marks the passing of the best friend Alaska's teamsters ever had. It also ends an amazing career that has shaken the very foundations of many of the state's economic institutions.

Mr. Carr leaves thousands of devoted friends who benefited from his aggressive leadership and the hard-dealing methods he applied on employers in their behalf. He also leaves hundreds of employers who, bruised and battered from their associations with him, would be inclined to greet the end of his era as teamster leader. He had a strong love/hate relationship with people, usually with each case easy to understand.

All can agree, however, that Jesse Carr's career was eminently successful in Alaska. He came here as a young man, his only "equipment" being the blessing of Dave Beck, then the labor boss of the Pacific Northwest. Mr. Beck had designated Mr. Carr to be his man in organizing Alaska. He parlayed that one blessing into an empire that reached its peak during the pipeline construction days when he became what some have termed the nation's most powerful union leader. The Teamsters dominated the 25,000 workers who built the pipeline.

Jesse Carr will be remembered for his success as an organizer and administrator of the Union. He has left indelible imprints on the economic structure of the state through his hard-knuckled wheeling and dealing of union contracts and pensions.

He was famous for his vicious devotion to unionism. He had a knack for discarding in the wastebasket, often literally, an employer's presentation of contract proposals with words like: "OK, now let's talk about this," whereupon he presented his demands that, ultimately, often became the contract.

Mr. Carr's terms were so severe that the list of businesses that folded under his terms would be long and astonishing. Simultaneously, however, his Teamster union members were never better off and were strong in his support.

During most of the years of his regime, Jesse Carr was known as a man of his word. A verbal deal was as good as a written one, it was said. He never went back on a deal once it was made, and all that.

Hard times for Mr. Carr and the union came with the reduction in memberships after the pipeline was built. He had undertaken enormous obligations in financing recreational facilities for the Teamsters, and had become involved in investments of his huge pension funds.

Although he was constantly under investigation for possible mistakes in judgment or even violations of the law, none was ever discovered and proven. As far as the record goes, it can be said that while his operation may have been lavish and expensive—with union planes rendering many special services to union members and especially certain officers—he ran a clean operation as far as the law is concerned.

An investment of pension funds in a housing project in Palm Springs proved his biggest financial headache when the houses failed to sell and the financial drain was great.

There are reports that Mr. Carr's many fine characteristics were blemished in the later years when he faced financial troubles. He lost some of his friends of long standing.

When death came, Mr. Carr was starting a new career as a national officer of the Teamsters union. It killed the expectations of his friends that he would become national president. It also closed the book on one of the most unusual careers of any Alaskan.

A SHARED LOSS

Alaska lost one of its most colorful and effective leaders on January 4th, when Jesse Carr died of a heart attack in California. His death is a loss shared by all Alaskans, because his life touched all Alaskans.

His death comes at an especially crucial time for the unions of Alaska. They are facing relentless assault financed by millions of dollars, as well as unfair and stubborn opposition from a federal government that should know better, and one that should be ashamed of itself. His kind of leadership and vision is exactly what labor must once again produce if the state is to hold on to its hard-earned and much-deserved standard of living.

Some Alaskans disagreed with Carr politically and philosophically, but he did as much as any leader the state has ever produced to make good things possible for Alaska, and that is an indisputable legacy.

We can only hope that Alaska will once again provide the right chemistry for the right person, so we can get on with the proper things for the working people of Alaska, History makes us believe that such hope is well-placed. But we also know that somehow things will never again be the same without Jesse Carr.

[From the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner, Jan. 9, 1985]

LABOR'S LOSS IS ALL ALASKA'S

Alaskans and others said goodbye to Teamster leader Jesse Carr Tuesday, at memorial services held in Ontario, Calif., to mark his death last Friday.

No other labor leader in Alaska has achieved the stature of Mr. Carr. He is credited with forging the powerful Teamsters Local 959, extending its influence during the pipeline construction years, and keeping it untainted by organized crime.

It seems likely that historians will have the final say on the full effects of Mr. Carr's influence, for he was a controversial figure during his own time. Nevertheless, he deserves a large measure of credit for union agreements during pipeline days that called for Alaska hire and prohibited union strikes during the project construction.

Though Mr. Carr was not a public person in the sense of seeking publicity for himself or his activities, friends and colleagues credit him with a strong dose of personal integrity, and the ability to extend a personal touch to those he worked with.

Since construction of the massive pipeline project was completed, the influence of unions in Alaska has undergone considerable change, following a pattern that is stretching across the nation. Just how that pattern will emerge in the future in Alaska is a subject for considerable speculation.

One thing's certain, though. Without Jesse Carr in the driver's seat, the Teamsters Union in Alaska will not be quite the same. No matter the feelings of Alaskans on labor issues, Jesse Carr uniformly earned our respect.

ASSEMBLYMAN CONTEMPLATES LABOR LEADER'S STUBBORN STYLE

(By Dave Walsh)

As I sat in the First Baptist Church in Ontario, Calif., during Jesse Carr's funeral it occurred to me that Jesse Carr was among the hardest and most tender men I've ever met.

The hard Jesse Carr had a faith in the working men and women of Alaska that was total, complete and without qualification. When negotiating on behalf of his members he asked for no quarter and he gave none.

The tender Jesse Carr was equally committed to those around him, Teamster or not. His dedicated and relentless pursuit of better health and retirement benefits for his members is well known.

Not as well known, however, is that Jesse Carr was a faithful, honest and consistent friend to those with whom he worked and lived. He would always help in times of trouble, quietly, without a lot of fanfare. When he asked in his characteristic greeting, "Well, how the heck are you?" you felt he really cared to know.

There were more flowers at his funeral than I had ever seen at a funeral. Dozens of floral arrangements as big as garage doors had been sent by people from all over the country.

More impressive, however, were the hundreds of small, simple, less expensive bouquets sent by Alaskans of moderate means. They appreciated all that Jesse had done for them and cared enough to send a small remembrance to their friend and champion.

The most striking aspect of the service were the people in the church. The prominent and the powerful were there because Jesse Carr had worked with them. But so were hundreds of ordinary, work-a-day Alaskans, because Jesse had worked for them.

U.S. Senators, elected and appointed officials from Alaska and Canada, international labor leaders and clerics from different denominations sat next to men and women from all over Alaska who took time away from their jobs to attend the funeral. Their bond with Jesse had spanned three decades and in their saddened eyes, the accomplishments of his life and pain could be plainly seen.

The speakers at the service all spoke quietly and affectionately of Carr as a friend and colleague. But the three Alaskan speakers moved me the most. Anchorage Archbishop Francis T. Hurley gave a comforting benediction that focused on the fact that Jesse Carr left Alaska better than he found it.

Sen. Ted Stevens spoke eloquently of Jesse Carr as an Alaskan and as an intelligent, hardworking man who put his state and its people first. John Forceskie, president of Teamsters Local 959, spoke of Jess as a union brother. His remarks came directly from the heart and expressed what most of us were feeling that day as he bid a touching farewell to a good and dear friend.

CARR REMEMBERED AS QUIET, GENTLE, AND A HARD NEGOTIATOR

(By Craig Medred and Jim Erickson)

Teamster Jesse Carr, was the most powerful labor leader in Alaska, and he made more than his share of enemies and friends in 33 years here.

Friends said Carr was a quiet and gentle man, but he carved for himself a reputation among friend and foe alike as a hard bargainer, a political powerbroker, a tough guy.

"He was the godfather to some great segment of the population," said former state Rep. Bill Parker, whom the Teamsters once tried to unseat.

"No question he was one of the best negotiators in the United States," said Sen. Pat Rodey, D-Anchorage, a long-time friend of Carr. "He had that touch. It's hard to describe or put in words."

Carr did not back down. He said what he was going to do, and then he did it. Friends and enemies agreed he was a man of integrity and almost unbelievable tenacity.

He pushed a strike against Anchorage Cold Storage for more than three years. It continues today.

"The thing you have to admire about the guy is that when he gave an employer a strike he gave them the best strike he knew how," said Frank Shoeppel, a federal labor negotiator.

"Jess was always good for his word," said Edgar Paul Boyko, a former Alaska attorney general.

It was Boyko who in the 1966 gubernatorial campaign first accused Carr and his union of running Alaska. The charge was to reach its peak during the construction of the trans-Alaska oil pipeline when Teamster ranks swelled to 28,000 members.

"Jess reached his finest hour during the pipeline boom," added Boyko, who later became an attorney for the Teamsters.

Carr negotiated lucrative contracts for Teamster employees.

"For a period there, Teamsters were receiving just enormous benefits," said then-Attorney General Avrum Gross. "He did things for that union that only governments are supposed to do."

As the union grew, millions of dollars in dues flowed into its coffers. Along with the money came political power.

There was speculation in the early 1970s that Carr had a strangehold on the state because of the ability to strike nearly all of the major transportation and communications centers.

Gross remembers discussions of that issue in the halls of the state Capitol in Juneau.

"It was a threatening force," Gross said, "but I didn't see it as a sinister thing. I always thought it was an economic problem."

By 1984, Carr's union had shrunk to 12,000 members. Its power diminished with its reduced size and smaller bankroll.

"Jess was too profligate in providing for his people out of the bonanza that was coming out of the pipeline," said Boyko. "He plowed most of the monetary benefits back into benefits for his people.

"He created a somewhat inflated welfare system that couldn't be supported by the members. He might have husbanded the resources better."

But there were heady days for Jesse Carr and the Teamsters when the pipeline was snaking its way across Alaska.

"He was the symbol of organized labor on the pipeline," said Parker. "A political endorsement from Jess Carr in those days was worth an awful lot, and not just financially."

Carr's chief political adversary through the 1970s was Gov. Jay Hammond.

Carr wanted public employees to bargain collectively; Hammond disliked the idea. Carr wanted the state to encourage industrial growth; Hammond didn't want new industry unless it benefited all the state's citizens.

"Carr was obviously a tough political adversary," said Gross, Hammond's confidant. Gross still remembers the first meeting between the labor leader and the governor from Bush Alaska.

"They were both ex-Marines," Gross said. "Hammond said that once everyone left they circled the table like two pit bulls."

"I remember Hammond had enormous respect for him. Hammond called it grudging admiration."

There were many who felt that way.

"Carr was very thorough, and very capable. He kept lots of options open, options for footwork," said Pete Nichols, a federal labor negotiator. "He didn't get himself boxed into a corner or cemented into a position that he might have to retreat from."

"There were some (labor leaders) who didn't like Jesse Carr," said Ike Waldrop, a former head of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in Alaska. "But that was probably just petty jealousy."

"He was a man of his word," said Boyko, who first met Carr while negotiating a contract for the Yellow Cab Co. 30 years ago.

"He was basically fair," said Boyko. "But he could be very, very tough if you got cute with him. He was direct, above board, no bullshit. If you gave him the honest approach, no problem. But don't lie to him."

"Boyko remembers the problems that befell the German brewers of Prinz Brau beer after they crossed Carr in Alaska. The Germans had asked for a moratorium on unionization when they built a brewery in the state."

"Jess said, 'How much time do you need?' They said a year, and he said, 'OK, but I get first crack. Just be fair with me and don't let me lose my advantage with being first around,' " Boyko said.

Boyko said the company reneged on the agreement. Carr was angry. The Teamsters eventually helped force Prinz Brau out of business.

"Jesse Carr believed that by taking care of Alaska's working men and women, Alaska itself would be built and bettered," said former Gov. Walter Hickel. "That's what he fought for and won, and that's his legacy."

"He was a great Alaskan, one of the strong characters that a strong land breeds," said Anchorage Mayor Tony Knowles, a one-time roughneck in the Alaska oil fields.

"He absolutely loved Alaska and was dedicated to it. And he was dedicated to his people."

Carr's fortunes climbed with the union in Alaska. He came to Anchorage in 1951 to drive a gravel truck. A close friend and former local 959 vice president, Orville Lake, remembers helping Carr fix up a small trailer and lean-to as a home for Carr and his wife, Helen. They had to dip into Helen's tips as a waitress at Peggy's Airport Cafe to pay for nails for the project.

Eventually, as the union grew, Carr came to own several homes and various property, but he did not live ostentatiously, said Boyko.

LAWMAKERS PAY TRIBUTE TO TEAMSTER

Official reaction to the death of Alaska Teamster leader Jesse Carr was quick in coming.

Gov. Bill Sheffield, who visited Carr while in Palm Springs last week, extended his condolences to the family this morning.

"Alaska has lost a great labor leader whose efforts on behalf of the working people will be felt for many years to come," Sheffield said in a statement released through his press office in Juneau.

Alaska Rep. Don Young, interrupted at a committee meeting in Washington, said he was "very saddened by the passing of Jesse Carr."

"He was a great labor leader who built a dynasty in Alaska and the western U.S. Alaskans should be proud of what he was able to accomplish for the working people in the state."

Young called him "a good friend and supporter and above all an honorable person who was always fair right down the line.

Sen. Ted Stevens also said he was saddened to hear of Carr's death.

"He was a good friend who worked hard to preserve amiable relations between labor and management," Stevens said.

"His work on the pipeline will long be remembered."

State Sen. Frank Ferguson, D-Kotzebue, a Teamster for more than 20 years, expressed similar sentiments.

"He was the kingpin of the Teamsters when he had to be, during the Trans-Alaska Pipeline, and it's very sad to hear of the passing of a man of his stature," Ferguson said.

Sen. Frank Murkowski was enroute to Palm Springs where he is vacationing with his family and could not be reached for comment.

The national Teamsters office here was working on a statement on Carr's death but it was not ready at press-time.

TRIBUTE TO REPRESENTATIVE GILLIS LONG

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, for those of us who belong to it, Democrats and Republicans alike, the Louisiana congressional delegation is a lot like a family. We work closely together, largely from the sense that, as a State, Louisiana is relatively so small, so diverse, so different that we cannot rely on anyone else to understand our unique situation. That is why we feel the loss of our friend and colleague Gillis Long so poignantly.

Gillis' district may have been the most diverse and different of all. To its service, he devoted 13 years of hard work and political acumen. His reward was his position in the House and Democratic Party leadership, a position which he used, not for partisan purposes, not to aggrandize himself, but to advance his very sensible ideas about the way in which the American people should govern themselves. He believed in moderation in all things, and he believed in looking at new ideas and new trends. Under his leadership, the Members of the House Democratic caucus submerged their differences and produced a series of working papers on the future of the party and the Nation. Many of the papers were notable contributions to the art and science of government; all were testimonials to the power that Gillis had to get people to do what he believed they ought to do. They did it because they genuinely liked him, and they respected him for his intelligence, his decency, his compassion for those less fortunate and his capacity for hard work.

Because we were his friends, we hoped in recent years that Gillis could find some way to work a little less and still satisfy his conscience. It was not possible: Gillis could not find it in his heart to give less than 200 percent to his constituents, his family and his country. The authors of "The Book of America," a survey of the politics of the 50 States, are not overly impressed by most politicians, so their approval of Gillis is the ultimate accolade. He served, they said, with unusual distinction in the House of Representatives. We, his colleagues, think so too.

ONLY 896 JEWS IMMIGRATE TO ISRAEL

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, as we begin this first session of the 99th Congress, I want to impress upon my colleagues something of immediate and pressing concern. What is it? It is the number 896.

Last year, the Soviet Union allowed only 896 Jews to immigrate to Israel. Only 896 of the estimated 400,000 Soviet Jews who have requested to leave. Only 896 were granted the privilege to leave the Soviet Union. And I use that world "privilege" very liberally. For it should not be a privilege but a right for Soviet Jews to immigrate to a country which wholeheartedly welcomes them, Israel.

The number of Soviet Jews to emigrate this year is the lowest since 1970. This is quite a change from 1979 when over 51,000 Jews left the Soviet Union for the religious freedom that they enjoy in Israel.

As the numbers of Soviet Jews permitted to leave has dropped dramatically, the persecution of those who stay has risen just as dramatically. Informed reports from within the Soviet Union tell us stories of arrests without charges, detentions without the basic amenities of life, and convictions for crimes never committed. Such is repugnant to human decency and we must do all that we can to put an end to it.

I hope that in 1985 we will see both a stop to the unfair treatment of Jews within the Soviet Union as well as heretofore unsurpassed numbers of Jews allowed to emigrate. Is this too much to hope for? Perhaps, but as we embark upon this 99th Congress, I ask my colleagues, is 896 too few to expect? The answer is unquestionably yes.

INTERSTATE COST ESTIMATE ACT

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, today I introduce highway legislation to permit the release of over $7 billion of interstate construction money that has been withheld from the States since last March because of the failure to adopt an interstate cost estimate. I am pleased to be joined by 25 of my colleagues as original cosponsors in the introduction of this important legislation.

Mr. President, the repeated failure in 1983 and 1984 to pass the interstate cost estimate [ICE] has resulted in long and expensive delays to our Nation's Interstate Construction Program. The legislation I am introducing today would remedy the problem by delegating to the Department of Transportation the authority to administratively establish interstate cost estimates on October 1 of each year, if Congress has failed to act by that time. Similar legislation passed the Senate last year as part of S. 2527, the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1984.

In past years, starting in 1958, approval of the ICE has occurred in a timely fashion every 2 years and was approved by the Congress by means of concurrent resolutions. Since the Supreme Court Chioda decision, the ICE has been approved by joint resolutions requiring the signature of the President.

Since congressional approval of the ICE has been accomplished by law, it has begun to attract increasing numbers of special provisions resulting in controversy and legislative gridlock. The 1983 ICE was approved 3 months late. In 1984, the ICE was delayed twice. In early March 1984, the President signed a 6-month ICE which was 5 months overdue and resulted in the delay of the release of approximately $5 billion of funds. Efforts to provide an ICE for the second half of 1984 and all of 1985 have now been delayed 10 months. This has resulted in the delay in the release of approximately $7 billion in interstate construction funds.

At the current time, 22 States have less than $1 million of unobligated interstate funds and 43 States have less than $10 million of interstate funds remaining. With the start of the spring construction season, highway construction across the country will come to a virtual standstill. As the Members know, the interstate cost estimate is a key factor in the distribution formula and its approval triggers the release of money that the Congress has already provided in the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982.

I believe that this legislation is the fairest and most direct way to resolve the current impasse and I am hopeful that we can do so in a very timely fashion in the months ahead.●

and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOBBS ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, today I am introducing along with 21 cosponsors, legislation aimed at eliminating an injustice that currently exists in our Federal criminal laws. That injustice stems from a 1973 decision by the U.S. Supreme Court known as United States versus Enmons, in which the Court ruled that the use of force or violence to coerce the payment of property, did not constitute extortion under the Hobbs Act, if the violence was undertaken in the pursuit of "legitimate union objectives."

Mr. President, in the Enmons case, (410 U.S. 396) striking workers at the Gulf States Utility Co. in Louisiana had been accused of coordinated attacks on company property resulting in damages of many tens of thousands of dollars. Rifle shots were fired into electrical transformers and their liquid coolents drained. The implications were clear, either meet the striking union's demands, or incur even heavier financial costs due to property damage.

Before trial began, the district judge dismissed the indictment because the acts of violence were undertaken for a "legitimate union objective." Under a direct appeal provision that then applied, the matter went directly to the U.S. Supreme Court, which, I regret to say, affirmed the district court's ruling by a 5-to-4 margin.

The Supreme Court's majority looked at the Hobbs Act (18 U.S.C. 1951) definition of extortion:

* * * the obtaining of property from another, with his consent, induced by the wrongful use of actual or threatened force, violence, or fear * * *

The Court then read the word "wrongful" as indicating a congressional intent to excuse violence intended to coerce payment of property if it was a "legitimate union objective." As evidence of this congressional intent, the Court quoted the words of Congressman Samual Hobbs, but misread him. In the congressional debates during the 78th Congress, Hobbs was asked by Congressman Marcantonio, "In connection with a strike * * *," and responded that "This bill does not cover strikes or any question relating to strikes * * * because a strike is perfectly lawful * * * the act must be unlawful to come within the purview of this bill."

It seems apparent to me that what Congressman Hobbs was saying was that a strike is legally permitted coercion in an economic sense, but that any act which is illegal in connection with a strike, is still illegal and punishable under the law. Yet this unfortunate exchange in the floor debate appears to be the sole basis of the majority's opinion.

In fact, supporters of a union exemption to the extortion law proposed an amendment to Congressman Hobbs' bill on three separate occasions. Each time, the amendment was defeated soundly. It is this fact, which the Court's majority simply ignored, that caused Justice William O. Douglas to remark in his dissent:

The Court today achieves by interpretation what those who were opposed to the Hobbs Act were unable to get Congress to do * * * the opposition (to Hobbs) lost in the 79th Congress what they win today.

How to protect the right of labor unions to use economic coercion while still punishing other means of coercion is a recurring legislative problem. The Supreme Court had also read an exemption for labor unions into the predecessor Federal extortion law, the Anti-Racketeering Act of 1934.

THE ANTI-RACKETEERING ACT

The Anti-Racketeering Act of 1934 (48 Stat. 979) also prohibited robbery and extortion but contained a section known as the "wage clause." This "wage clause" provision said that racketeering was using force to coerce payment of money, unless the payment represented "the payment of wages by a bona fide employer to a bona fide employee." The wage clause was an attempt to exclude from the criminal laws, legitimate wage demands of labor unions that were not accompanied by violent coercion, but the Court took it farther than Congress intended.

In United States v. Local 807, International Brotherhood of Teamsters (315 U.S. 521). The Supreme Court ruled that this exception covered members of New York City Teamsters Local No. 807 which had exacted payments from out-of-town truckers for the unwanted and superfluous service of driving the trucks, or allowing them to be driven, within the city of New York.

The Local 807 case saw union members, with the apparent approval of the union's officers, stopping out-of-town truckers at shotgun-point in the Holland Tunnel and other points of entry into New York City. There the gun-toting Teamsters would offer the out-of-town truckers a choice: They could either pay the local union a sum for the privilege of driving their trucks on the streets of New York, or they could hire a member of the local union to drive the truck for them. The shotgun made the out-of-town trucker's other choice clear.

The Supreme Court of the United States held that the union could not be prosecuted for extorting the payment of money to the union at the threat of physical harm, because the Federal racketeering law contained the language "not including * * * the payment of wages by a bona fide employer to a bona fide employee * * *". In the view of the Supreme Court, the fact that the out-of-town truckers had been forced at gunpoint to hire the local's drivers was irrelevant. The mere fact that the payment to the union had taken the form of wages was enough to remove it from the racketeering law.

The language of the racketeering statute was not intended to exempt such coercion from the law. Rather, it was intended to protect the right of union members to engage in a strike or similar concerted activity to obtain their goals. A strike is inherently coercive in an economic sense, but we have made a decision of public policy to allow a strike against an employer. This coercion loses, however, its legal and protected status when the strikers resort to violence and intimidation. Then, the coercion flows not from the worker's refusal to work until their demands are met, but rather from the fear of property damage or physical harm. This is what the Court failed to distinguish in the Local 807 case and again in Enmons. As a result, the Court construed Congress' decision to shield economic coercion as a decision to exempt violent coercion from prosecution whenever the payment took the form of wages.

The Court's decision, in effect, exempted all violent activity and coercion from the Federal law if it had as its basis a labor-management quarrel. This clearly was beyond what Congress had intended to do in the 1934 act and "congressional disapproval of this decision was swift," in the words of Justice Douglas. Several bills were introduced with the purpose of overturning the Supreme Court's decision in the Local 807 case. The bill which eventually passed and became known as the Hobbs Act, eliminated the "wage clause" that had been the basis of the Supreme Court's decision in that case.

Mr. President, what I propose is essentially a continued effort to apply the extortion law equally to everyone, without regard to their union status or purpose. In this effort, we seek to correct the Court's reading of the word "wrongful." I believe that the Supreme Court misread Congress' intent when it interpreted the word "wrongful" to exempt violence pursued for a legally permissible objective, just as an earlier court gave an overly broad interpretation to the "wage clause." I agree with Congressman Hobbs that "violence is violence, crime is crime, no matter who commits it, and that robbery is robbery, and extortion is extortion, whether or not the perpetrator has a union card." I believe that it is time for Congress to say so with finality, by passing this amendment to the Hobbs Act.

A PATTERN OF VIOLENCE

Mr. President, for 10 years between 1961 and 1971, when I worked at the

51-059 O-86-39 (Pt. 1)

Waterloo Register Co. in Cedar Falls, IA, I carried a union card and was a voluntary member of the International Association of Machinists. When my union went out on strike, I went out on strike. The men and women that I worked with and went out on strike with, did not believe that they had a right to use force or violence to get their way. I do not believe that the overwhelming majority of working men and women union members do either.

But there are some bad apples who apparently do believe that they have a right to use violence, and it has been happening all too often in labor-management strife. During a series of hearings in the last Congress, the Senate Judiciary Committee and its Subcommittee on Separation of Powers under the able chairmanship of my colleague from North Carolina [Senator EAST], heard more than a dozen victims of union violence from as many States, describe what happened to them when they did not "go along" with union demands.

On June 8, 1983, Bob Wholsen went to his company's construction site near Lancaster, PA, because he had been told that union picketers were blocking the access to it. When he got there, Bob was attacked and struck on the side of the head with a hard object and knocked to the ground. His lawyer was held down while an official of the Philadelphia Area Building and Trades Council poured hot coffee on him; and Bob's son-in-law who was carrying a video camera, was beaten and his camera destroyed. As a result of his injuries, Bob suffered a subneural hematoma and was forced to undergo two separate brain surgery operations. In addition to severe personal injury, Bob's company has suffered because area developers are afraid of "union trouble" if they hire Wholsen Construction. No one was ever punished for the violence.

Cher and Walter Mungovan started a construction company on the island of Maui, HI in 1979. Within 2 years, C&W Construction was doing over a million dollars' worth of business. Then the Hawaii Carpenters Union started an organizing effort at the Mungovan firm and an election was held in which the employees voted unanimously to remain nonunion. The election should have stopped the picketing under Federal law, but instead, the picketing continued and turned violent. C&W Construction began to lose business because developers were threatened with violence if they hired them. Then the union offered Walter Mungovan a deal. His problems would be over if he would just disregard the employees vote to remain nonunion, sign a contract with the Carpenters Union, fire his employees and hire through the union hall. When Walter sought help from local and Federal authorities, he found that he was on his own. His life was threatened, his family harassed, job sites burned and tools stolen, but local law enforcement officials looked the other way, and sometimes, even sided with the union.

When Cher and Walter went to the U.S. attorney in Hawaii, they learned that the union could get away with what it was doing because of the Enmons loophole in the Hobbs Act.

Since then, Cher and Walter have been able to prove that the union officials had lied in the affidavits filed with the NLRB, and the head of the Carpenter's Union has been convicted on multiple counts of perjury. But this tragic story has no happy ending. The Mungovan family now lives separately. Walter is in the Federal Witness Protection Program, Cher and her 11-year-old son, Ian, live in Hawaii.

Mr. President, I cannot describe to my colleagues how I felt last April in the anteroom of the Senate Judiciary Committee, when Walter Mungovan and his son saw each other for the first time in more than 1 year. Walter Mungovan is in hiding—not because he did anything wrong, but because he did what all parents tell their children that they should do. Stand up for what is right, report crimes to the police, testify against criminals. He did that and he is in hiding, while the union officials who have now been convicted of crimes remain free pending appeal—where I might add, they have been caught recently committing the same crimes again.

Mike Ashby, a lumber worker in northern Idaho, and Sheriff Ron Smith of Boundary County, ID, told the Judiciary Committee on firebombings, gun shots, rocks and bottles being hurled at nonstriking workers at the Louisiana Pacific Co. Both brought into the hearing "captured weapons" that had been used by the union to deter nonstrikers from working. These included Molotov cocktails, homemade devices casually known as frisbees and spiders as well as items resembling punji sticks from Vietnam. Steel ball bearings were fired from wrist rocket slingshots at car and truck windows, and at people.

What is most frightening is that Mr. Ashby testified to being present at the union's meeting when an officer of the international union actually encouraged the strikers to engage in violent harassment of the nonstriking workers and to destroy company property.

Sheriff Smith proved himself to be an exceptional and courageous man. His Sheriff's department did try to stem the tide of violence, but, as he told the committee, his six deputies were simply not enough to control the violence that occurs when an entire segment of the community chooses to disregard the law.

John Pickell of the Brinderson Corp. of Irvine, CA, told the committee of death threats and firebombings of company facilities, while they were on the premises of a U.S. Air Force base in Montana. Local and State officials were either unable or unwilling to prevent the violence there.

Horace Guyton of New Jersey continued to work at his janitorial job because he could not afford to participate in the strike, and because the union officials refused to tell him why they were on strike. His wife was followed and subjected to verbal harassment while he was at work and while she was alone with their child. On one occasion, Mr. Guyton was threatened at knifepoint and called the police. When the police arrived, they met first with the union picketers and then threatened to arrest Guyton—the victim—for harassing the picketers if he ever called the police again.

I have met Horace Guyton. He is a courageous young man, but he is not particularly large or threatening in appearance or manner. I seriously doubt that he had threatened a group of picketers. The calculated brutality of the union in this case went even further. A "hit list" of Horace and other nonstriking workers was maintained and posted at the union hall. The hit list contained not only the name of the nonstriking workers, but also their home addresses. When Guyton was forced to move out of concern for his family's safety, the list was updated with his new address.

David Young of Florida was doing construction work when a mob of union supporters trapped him and several other workers in a room and threatened to kill them. Heavy equipment was dropped from upper levels of the construction site. One of the pieces of equipment came through the roof of David's pickup truck while he was fleeing. Had the equipment landed just a few inches nearer to the driver's side of the truck, David probably would have died.

Yet another construction incident involved Gerry Bartow. He was doing construction work in Port Huron, MI with nonunion labor. More than 400 union picketers stormed the construction site and destroyed his company equipment. He and several of his employees were trapped on the rooftop of a building for several hours by an angry mob. When Bartow was rescued by the sheriff's police and a handful of the mob's leaders were arrested, an aide to Michigan's Governor asked that the union leaders be released from jail. On another occasion, the Governor's office applied pressure on the sheriff to remove Bartow and his workers from the job site.

When 28-year-old graduate student Sygmund Kaye stopped at a building he had invested in to check on the remodeling work that had been done, he found 15 men wearing yellow tee shirts doing a little remodeling of their own. The men were beating and ripping apart the work that had been done by the nonunion crew Sygmund had hired. When Sygmund demanded to know what they were doing, several of them beat Sygmund Kaye to the point that he is now partially paralzed. As they were leaving the scene, Sygmund saw the men board a grey bus—the same grey bus, I might add, that brought thugs to Bob Wohlsen's job-site—and he took down the license number. The grey bus was registered to the Philadelphia Area Buildings and Trades Council. But the police would do nothing. The district attorney told him that "it is an election year" when he refused to do anything. So bold were the thugs in the Philadelphia area that the men who beat Sygmund Kaye into paralysis wore tee-shirts proclaiming: "Union Carpenters, We Hit Harder."

Mr. President, still other victims of union violence have been invited to testify before the Judiciary Committee, but were afraid of further violence, and even more we simply could not fit into a busy schedule. Without revealing which witnesses were afraid to tell the Senate what happened, I wish to describe some of their stories.

Karen Minnetta is a divorced mother of two children, aged 5 and 11 in 1983. Karen was working as a flight attendant during the strike by employees of Continental Airlines in Texas. She continued to work for the same reason that Horace Guyton did, she had a family and needed the money. Karen was awakened about 12:30 a.m. on December 3, 1983 by the smell of smoke. Downstairs she found her condominium on fire, and a gallon size can containing a flammable liquid. Her sliding glass door was opened, and the word "SCAB" was painted on the outside of her home.

After getting her children out of the apartment alive, Karen ran throughout the nearby condominium units knocking on doors and warning others of a fire which was in danger of spreading to other buildings. According to some of Karen's neighbors, she was hysterical and was yelling, "It's my fault." Think about that, her home was on fire, a gas can was in plain view, as was the word "SCAB," and Karen had been caused to believe that it was her fault that her neighbors were going to lose their homes—because she had crossed a picket line.

Nor was Karen the only person threatened with serious violence in that strike. In San Antonio, two striking Continental pilots were arrested when they attempted to evade a routine license checkpoint set up by the State police. Before their arrest, they threw out the window of their car a bag containing pipe bombs—that's right, pipe bombs. Inside the car was the address and a photograph of the home of nonstriking pilot David Guildhart, located about a mile away from the checkpoint. Was David Guildhart about to see his home destroyed, perhaps to blame himself, like Karen Minnetta, for crossing a picketline?

Guildhart might not have been as lucky as Karen Minnetta if it hadn't been for the routine checkpoint. He was in Chicago as part of his business, and his family was at home.

In Alabama, 21-year-old Russell Gillian was shot in the face, and 20-year-old Roger Patterson was shot in the arm, while crossing the picket line at the Birmingham Manufacturing Co., on October 1, 1983. The bullet is still lodged in Russell's cheek because doctors are afraid that removing it could cost him his life.

In eastern Kentucky in 1982, a United Mine Workers Union wrote local checks for $3,000 to pay for guns and ammunition in a strike. But here a Hobbs Act conviction was obtained—but for one unique reason. The violent strike was part of a conspiracy with a unionized company to put its nonunion competitors out of business. Had there been no conspiracy with the employer, the gunfire would have been permissible as a "legitimate union objective." At one point, the strikers were so bold as to have opened fire on the Kentucky State Police when they tried to restore order.

In Montana, the Oklahoma based Haines Pipeline Co. was constructing a pipeline for the Montana Power Co. Periodic violence involving hundreds of picketers resulted in personal injury to workers and destruction of company property. During some of the worst of the Montana violence, a bomb blast destroyed the office of the Haines Co. president—in Oklahoma. Clearly there was an interstate—not just local—conspiracy to intimidate the company into agreeing to union demands.

On January 26, 1984, John Knighton was working as a security guard during a strike in Lake Charles, LA, when he was shot in the face and chest with a shotgun. At 28 years of age, John has been permanently blinded.

In southern Arizona, during the long and bitter strike at Phelps Dodge, violence and baseball bats were a common occurrence. In one tragic incident, 3-year-old Chandra Talant laid asleep in her bed as a bullet passed through the walls of her home striking her in the head. Her father, Keith, was not honoring the strike and continued to work. Keith Talant later died in a one-car auto accident. We cannot say with certainty that the strike and these tragedies were related, but I fear they are.

In Toledo, OH, an estimated 2,000 picketers attacked police protecting the plant gates of the AP Parts plant with baseball bats, bottles, bricks, and rocks. A police van was burned and 18 police vehicles heavily damaged.

Mr. President, the violence is not confined to industrial States such as Pennsylvania and Michigan. Since 1981, there have been periodic incidents of violence in my home State of Iowa, in downtown Des Moines. Gunshots and firebombing of vehicles have done more than $1.5 million in damages to local construction companies and the city. Clearly, Mr. President, there exists a nationwide pattern of violence.

ORGANIZED CRIME BENEFITS FROM THE ENMONS EXEMPTION

Mr. President, according to the 1981 Labor Department report of the Inspector General, over 400 labor organizations are "directed, influenced, or controlled by organized crime." Extortion, kickbacks, and illegal payments are a major problem in areas where Federal law requires companies to deal with mobsters who control these local unions. According to the Labor Department report:

> Employers who want their cargos unloaded or to keep their business open too frequently are forced to bow to extortionate demands. Although the problem is perhaps more prevalent in the construction industry, no business is immune . . .

A scenario under which organized crime working through a union can gain substantial influence over a legitimate business is easy to construct. Union leaders with organized crime ties could threaten an employer with "labor troubles" if he does not do what is demanded. The demands could involve requiring the company to grant a concession to a mob-controlled company for vending machines or cafeteria services, or a strike will be called at the end of the contract period—or immediately, alleging a contract violation. While most union leaders are good people who work hard for their members, this happens all too frequently.

Mr. President, the Federal Bureau of Investigation testified in favor of the legislation I propose, and reported several instances in which an FBI investigation of extortion involving organized crimes was blocked because of the Enmons loophole in the Hobbs Act. In each case, Federal officials provided their information to State and local authorities. In each of the cases, local prosecutions were unsuccessful.

Indeed, the FBI told the Senate Judiciary Committee that four large international unions are "substantially influenced and/or controlled by organized crime," and that "in these four unions, organized crime figures routinely extort employers or companies whose employees they represent." "Routinely," Mr. President, employers are extorted by these unions, according to the FBI, but the FBI cannot do a thing about it because of the Enmons decision.

Of course, this keeps these unions in the control of these organized crime figures who do not need to respond to union members, because a fair and open election will not be held.

Mr. President, Congress has repeatedly attempted to make extortion a Federal crime without regard to who commits it, while at the same time permitting economic coercion unaccompanied by violence or threats of violence. Each time Congress has chosen to punish coercion, but the courts have construed the statutes more narrowly. Now is the time for us to resolve this conflict clearly. Across the street from these Chambers are inscribed the words "Equal Justice Under Law." Let us now proceed to give renewed meaning to those words and make the law clear, that extortion is extortion—no matter who commits it.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this legislation be printed in the RECORD, along with a newspaper clipping from the January 6 Des Moines Sunday Register, detailing recent violence in Iowa.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 300

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) paragraph (2) of subsection (b) of section 1951 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(2) The term 'extortion' means the obtaining of property from another, with his or her consent, induced by use of actual or threatened force, violence, or fear thereof, or wrongful use of fear not involving force or violence, or under color of official right.".

(b) Subsection (c) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(c) Nothing in this section shall be construed as indicating an intent on the part of the Congress—

"(1) to repeal, modify, or affect section 17 of title 15, the Act of March 23, 1932, popularly known as the Norris-La Guardia Act (47 Stat. 70; 29 U.S.C. 52, 101, 115, 151-166), or the Railway Labor Act (45 U.S.C. 151-188); or

"(2) to exclude Federal jurisdiction over the offenses defined in this section on the ground that the conduct is also a violation of State or local law, or that the conduct, if it involves force, violence or fear of force or violence, takes place in the course of a legitimate business or labor dispute or in pursuit of a legitimate business or labor objective.".

(c) Section 1951 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(d) It is an affirmative defense to a prosecution under this section that the conduct of the defendant—

"(1) was incidental to peaceful picketing in the course of a legitimate labor dispute, as defined in section 2(9) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended (29 U.S.C. 152(9));

"(2) consisted solely of minor bodily injury, or minor damage to property not exceeding a value of $2,500, or a threat of such minor injury or damage; and

"(3) was not intended to extort property.".

VANDALISM ON THE JOBSITE—CONTRACTORS BEMOAN YEARS OF DAMAGE

(By Rick Jost)

Holiday season sabotage at some major downtown Des Moines buildings is only the most brazen example of a high-priced vandalism problem at Iowa job sites, angry contractors say.

Pinpointing the perpetrators has been difficult. Contractors suspect some of the problems stem from disputes between unions, or between union and non-union workers. The unions defend their members, saying there is no proof and it would be "self-defeating" for its members to commit such crimes.

But the federal government is now investigating the situation, as the trouble continues.

Since mid-1981 vandals have tossed acid on a contractor's car, spray-painted a new building, knocked down a building wall with a backhoe, fired bullets and set off fire bombs at construction trailers, and knifed tires and shot holes through construction equipment, among other things, according to a report to the Des Moines Construction Council's board of directors.

And those are some of the minor incidents.

In that same period vandals have also "torched" five cement trucks, causing $200,000 in damage; "torched" a fast-food restaurant, causing $100,000 in damage, and used acid to ruin $125,000 worth of specialized siding for a metal building, the contractor group's report said.

Last July "people who knew what they were doing" found a way to collapse the entire steel frame of a lumber company's new building under construction in Altoona. The result was $200,000 in damage, said Scott Norvell, manager of Des Moines Construction Council Inc.

Construction groups say 83 acts of vandalism totaling more than $1.5 million in damage have been reported within the past four years "in Des Moines and surrounding areas."

Norvell and others in the construction industry say the costly sabotage of job-site property is out of control.

"It's time that this kind of stuff comes to an end," Norvell said.

Construction site vandalism is a statewide problem, but "it tends to be more concentrated in urban areas," said William Hansen of Associated General Contractors. But when it comes to "dollar volume and severity, it's centered in Polk County."

At the Iowa Division of Criminal Investigation, reports of construction site vandalism in Polk County increased during 1984 compared with previous years, DCI Director Thomas Ruxlow said.

Ruxlow, who would not disclose DCI figures, said the increase could simply represent "more awareness" and increased reporting of such crimes in the Polk County area.

It's difficult to arrest the culprits responsible for the damage, because the crimes often occur in the dead of night and usually at remote construction sites. Many times it's impossible to pin down whether the destruction is the handiwork of mischievous youths or an attack on a company.

A frustrated James Ryan, general manager of Master Builders of Iowa, said "no one's ever been apprehended. And we apprehend guys for stealing $500 from a 7-Eleven on a regular basis."

"If you can go out and shoot a major building at Fifth and Grand, you're not too worried about being caught," Ryan said, referring to the bold Christmas-week shootings of windows at the new Des Moines convention center and two other downtown buildings.

Even last week, the sabotage at downtown construction sites continued. Workers at the Plaza, a 25-story condominium tower, found that someone had tampered with the power cable to a manlift.

Although it appeared the deed was intended only to keep the manlift from working, the altered cable could have sent 480 volts through the manlift and caused electrocution, said spokesmen for developer Ted Glasrud Associates of St. Paul, Minn.

A police report indicated that whoever rigged the power cable "knew what they were doing," but Glasrud officials said they don't know who is responsible for the act.

The window shoot-out a week earlier is a different story. Norvell and Ryan are among those who suspect the shootings and some earlier incidents are linked to a long-running battle over jobs involving two unions—the glaziers and the ironworkers.

In fact, "we all saw it coming, we knew it was coming," Ryan said of the trouble at the convention center.

Gunshots, apparently from a pellet gun, damaged 51 panes of glass valued at $64,399 at the convention center, 30 window panes worth about $7,000 at the Capitol Center 3 office complex under construction near the Statehouse, and more than 12 large panes of glass and lights at Forman Ford and Co. Forman Ford is the glazing subcontractor for the convention center project.

The FBI has joined the investigation of the shootings.

"Our investigation is to determine if there is any violation of a federal law," said Robert Keane, supervisory special agent for the FBI in Des Moines. Specifically, he said, the FBI is checking for violations of the Hobbs Act, an anti-racketeering law making it a crime to interfere with interstate commerce by violence or threatened violence to people or property.

Asked whether the FBI investigation was limited to the downtown shootings or whether it was also probing other incidents, Keane said, "We're looking at the totality of circumstances that surround it."

Though Ryan and Norvell have no proof, they say circumstances surrounding the window-shootings point to a long-running "jurisdictional dispute" between the glaziers and the ironworkers over the right to install window frames.

That job was handled by the glaziers at both the convention center and Capitol Center 3, and Forman Ford and Glass Co. was the glazing subcontractor on the convention center job, said Orville Crowley, president of the convention center's construction firm of Ringland, Johnson and Crowley Co.

Norvell, who represents management in construction industry labor negotiations, said he sensed trouble brewing at the convention center job site early last August, during a discussion he had with Earl Harris, business representative for Ironworkers Local 67.

Norvell said Harris had told him, "basically," that if the ironworkers were not assigned the job of installing the convention center window frames, "there was going to be some problems."

Said Ryan, "These guys seem to have a different marketing technique."

Harris, in an interview, said he did not recall "making any statement like that" comment recounted by Norvell.

Harris also said he did not have any knowledge of Local 67 officers making similar "innuendos" to Crowley, as Crowley alleged.

"I don't have any knowledge as to who was responsible for what happened down there," said the ironworkers official.

From Aug. 23 through Oct. 22, the Des Moines Construction Council sent five letters and telegrams to the international union offices of the ironworkers and the glaziers, asking them to step in and resolve the jurisdictional dispute. Those pleas brought no results, Norvell said.

Aaron Davis of St. Louis, Mo., a general representative of the glazier's international union, said he discussed the Des Moines dispute with Robert Arric, an international representative of the ironworkers' union.

The two agreed to urge leaders of the Des Moines local unions to get together and settle their differences, Davis said.

"That's all I can do," Davis said, adding, "I'm not going to go in and force my guys off the work."

Unionized glaziers and ironworkers were operating under a complicated national agreement covering metal, glass and some painting jobs until 1974, when the glaziers pulled out of it, Davis said.

"But even with the agreement, there was bad blood then" between the two unions, Davis said.

Norvell of the Construction Council said he had been especially worried about the convention center last fall "based on what had happened in the past."

He and Ryan both said they believe much of the construction site vandalism in the Des Moines area is tied either to the dispute between these two unions, or to clashes between union and non-union workers.

One of the buildings victimized by the window-shootings—Capitol Center 3—was a project covered by the local United Committees of Labor and Management, or Unicon labor-management construction program, said Charles Stroh, co-chairman of the group.

With Unicon's help, about 20 construction projects have proceeded successfully without work-stopping jurisdictional disputes among unions, Stroh said.

"Obviously, this is something that Unicon just deplores," Stroh said of the downtown vandalism.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I want to express my continued support for S. 300. I am pleased to see that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY] is reintroducing his bill to amend the Hobbs Act in order to correct the unfortunate decision by the U.S. Supreme Court in the Enmons case. Since that 1973 decision, which held that the Hobbs Act was not violated by the "use of violence to achieve legitimate union objectives, such as higher wages * * *," the Federal Government has not had the ability to effectively punish acts of extortion and violence when they occur in a labor-management context.

One of the most important and legitimate responsibilities of government is to ensure, to the greatest extent practical, that law abiding citizens are free to live and work in peace—free from the threat or use of violence. And, while I firmly believe that law enforcement is the primary responsibility of State and local governments, the Federal Government has a significant role to play in the prevention and prosecution of localized acts of violence which disrupt interstate commerce.

The Hobbs Act, which makes it a Federal crime to obstruct interstate commerce by robbery or extortion, is an important tool in bringing justice to those who use actual or threatened violence as a means to gain wealth and power. Because of the astonishing holding in the Enmons decision, parties involved in labor-management disputes enjoy a unique exemption from the Hobbs Act. They alone are not subject to Federal investigation and prosecution for using force or fear to obtain property in an interstate context. No other group can use the lame excuse that they believed that they deserved more money to avoid criminal penalties for employing extortionate violence. No group or individual should be able to.

As chairman of the Labor and Human Resources Committee I have heard countless witnesses testify of the pain and injury which they have suffered as a result of violence arising out of labor-management disputes. How frustrating it has been to hear how the criminals who have seriously injured people go unpunished because State and local officials frequently lack the resources to see that justice is done.

In America we cherish the notion that no one is above the law. The Hobbs Act needs to be amended to reflect that principle. This bill is not designed to subject those involved in minor picketline scuffles to Federal prosecution. Nor has it been drafted in an effort to undermine worthy union objectives. The sole goal of this legislation is to make it clear to labor and management alike that extortion and the destruction of life and property to the degree they have any impact on interstate commerce are Federal crimes no matter who you are or what your motive is.

For over a decade now Federal agencies—such as the FBI—as well as Federal prosecutors have been hamstrung in their efforts to curtail industrial violence because of the Enmons decision. The measure proposed today will restore the ability of the Federal Government to fulfill its obligation to assist State and local law enforcement authorities in the punishment and prevention of instances of serious, extortionate violence. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this amendment to the Hobbs Act. It is long overdue.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from Iowa, Mr. GRASSLEY, as an original cosponsor of a bill which addresses the Supreme Court's mistaken interpretation of the Hobbs Act in its 1973 decision in United States v. Enmons, 410 U.S. 396. That misinterpretation has allowed union members to engage with impunity in violence and threats of violence in the name of pursuing "legitimate" union goals.

Mr. President, according to statistics published by the Industrial Research Unit of the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania, there were, at least 4,350 acts of violence committed by union members from 1975 to 1984. Those acts of violence were not isolated to any one area of the country but have been nationwide in scope. In fact, every State represented in this body has experienced incidents of union violence. Since 1975 there have been 36 documented incidents in Alaska; 21 documented incidents in Arkansas; 88 documented incidents in Arizona; 454 documented incidents in California; 44 documented incidents in Colorado; 108 documented incidents in Connecticut; 16 documented incidents in District of Columbia; 13 documented incidents in Delaware; 79 documented incidents in Florida; 38 documented incidents in Georgia; 22 documented incidents in Hawaii; 44 documented incidents in Iowa; 31 documented incidents in Idaho; 125 documented incidents in Illinois; 115 documented incidents in Indiana; 16 documented incidents in Kansas; 225 documented incidents in Kentucky; 62 documented incidents in Louisiana; 87 documented incidents in Massachusetts; 34 documented incidents in Maryland; 20 documented incidents in Maine; 174 documented incidents in Michigan; 68 documented incidents in Minnesota; 199 documented incidents in Missouri; 25 documented incidents in Mississippi; 62 documented incidents in Montana; 40 documented incidents in North Carolina; 4 documented incidents in North Dakota; 11 documented incidents in New Hampshire; 186 documented incidents in New Jersey; 11 documented incidents in New Mexico; 38 documented incidents in Nevada; 249 documented incidents in New York; 227 documented incidents in Ohio; 115 documented incidents in Oklahoma; 66 documented incidents in Oregon; 390 documented incidents in Pennsylvania; 54 documented incidents in Rhode Island; 10 documented incidents in South Carolina; 5 documented incidents in South Dakota; 179 documented incidents in Tennessee; 99 documented incidents in Texas; 8 documented incidents in Utah; 11 documented incidents in Vermont; 91 documented incidents in Virginia; 90 documented incidents in Washington; 75 documented incidents in West Virginia; 115 documented incidents in Wisconsin; 2 documented incidents in Wyoming; and in my home State of Alabama there were 68 documented incidents of union violence.

While I will not take the Senate's time to summarize all of the 68 incidents in Alabama, I will cite one incident which involved the injury of two young men in a dispute on a picketline at Birmingham Manufacturing Co., in Springville, AL. Russell Ray Gillian of Pell City, AL, was shot in the face with a gun of an unknown caliber when he reportedly confronted pickets at the plant. Roger Lee Patterson, a worker from Springville, AL, was shot in the arm. There were other examples of union violence at the Birmingham Manufacturing Co. plant during that strike, involving harassment of company workers, property vandalism in the form of smashed windows, damaged cars, tacks thrown in driveways, puncturing of tires, fires, and the like. The remaining incidents demonstrate a similar lack of respect for the law.

I would ask unanimous consent that certain news articles detailing these and other acts of union violence be placed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, thanks to the loophole created in the Hobbs Act by the Supreme Court, few of the incidents of union violence result in prosecution. The bill introduced today would close that loophole by allowing criminal prosecution of individuals involved in violent, extortionate labor union tactics. It would allow for the punishment of individuals who use or threaten the use of force or violence during strikes or similar union activities.

Moreover, passage of the bill would correct the clear implication of the Enmons decision that the legitimacy of the ends sought by union agents—contract concessions—exempts them from prosecution under the Hobbs Act for the use of wanton destruction as a means to force employers to accede to their demands. If we follow the "ends justifies the means" rationale of Enmons, we in effect condone the systematic destruction of property and the maiming or killing of innocent individuals in order to obtain higher wages or better fringe benefits for union members.

The bill would not interfere with the right of workers to strike for higher wages. Its provisions would come into effect only if a strike goes beyond the mere withholding of labor to include activities such as shooting, dynamiting, and arson directed against employers and nonstriking workers. The bill explicitly exempts minor incidental incursions. The fact that the actions of a defendant caused only a minor bodily injury, or minor damage to property not exceeding $2,500, would be an affirmative defense to a prosecution under my amendment.

Mr. President, I continue to believe that this legislation is of paramount importance. I commend Senator GRASSLEY and the other Members of Congress who are endeavoring to free the workplaces of our Nation from violence.

We need the peacefulness that this bill would bring. We need teamwork and cooperation in the workplace, not extortion and violence.

Thank you, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TWO HURT IN SPRINGVILLE PICKET LINE DISPUTE

(By Lou Ann Ray)

Two young men were injured Wednesday night in a dispute on a picket line at Birmingham Manufacturing Co. in Springville, according to St. Clair Co. Sheriff's Department reports.

Russell Ray Gillian, 21, of Route 2 Box 484 Pell City was shot in the face with a gun of an unknown caliber when he reportedly confronted picketers at the trailer manufacturing plant. Also injured was a coworker, Roger Lee Patterson, 20, of Route 1 Box 323 Springville. He was shot in the arm and is listed in satisfactory condition at St. Clair County Hospital, according to a hospital spokeswoman. The condition of Gillian could not be obtained, but a sheriff's department spokesman said he was transferred to University Hospital in Birmingham.

Both Patterson and Gillian are employed as welders at the factory. The shooting reportedly occurred at about 7:30 when Gillian and Patterson returned to the company after they had left from work. Patterson had found some tacks in his driveway when he returned from work Wednesday, according to St. Clair County Investigator Richard Smith. Smith said Patterson and Gillian were taking the tacks back to the picket line.

When they arrived, tacks were thrown at the men, Smith said, and a picketer yelled "He's got a gun." Two shots were reportedly fired at Gillian and Patterson.

No arrests have been made. The incident is being investigated by the sheriff's department and the Springville Police Department.

Eighty-four members of United Steel Workers Union 7832 walked off their jobs in early May in a dispute primarily centered around insurance benefits. "There is nothing to indicate it (the strike) will be at an end at this point," Plant General Manager Richard Norman said. Norman declined to make comments about the shooting.

The Wednesday shooting was not the first incident of violence since the 20-week-old strike began. Problems reportedly began occurring after management ran advertisements asking for permanent workers interested in replacing strikers. Violence occurred at the plant on several occasions, two of which two union men were charged with harassment early in the strike and four picketers were arrested in connection with smashed car windows that resulted in a shoulder injury to one man, according to earlier reports.

ST. CLAIR MEN INJURED NEAR PICKET LINE

SPRINGVILLE.—Authorities said this morning they didn't know who fired the shots that wounded two St. Clair County men Wednesday night during a picket line disturbance between striking workers and nonstrikers at Birmingham Manufacturing Co. in Springville.

St. Clair County sheriff's deputy Richard Smith and Roger Lee Patterson, 20, of Springville and Russell Ray Gillian, 21, of Pell City were wounded in a quarrel with striking workers. Both men had refused to join striking workers at the plant, Smith said.

Gillian, wounded in the face, was in good condition this morning at University Hospital in Birmingham, a hospital spokesman said. Patterson, wounded in the arm, was in good condition this morning at St. Clair County Hospital, a spokesman said.

Smith said he wasn't sure who fired the shots. There were "a number" of picketers on the picket line when the shots were fired at about 7 p.m., Smith said. Gillian and Patterson had already left work but had returned to the plant when the incident happened, Smith said. He wasn't sure why the men returned, he said.

During the "disturbance," someone fired "two or three shots," wounding the two men, Smith said.

Workers at Birmingham Manufacturing have been on strike since they walked off their jobs May 9 in a dispute over insurance benefits, Smith said.

Several disturbances have broken out between strikers and non-strikers in the past few months, Smith said.

FOUR MEN ARRESTED ON PICKET LINE AT SPRINGVILLE PLANT

Springville.—Police arrested four men Wednesday during a disturbance at Birmingham Manufacturing plant in Springville, where a strike by members of the United Steelworkers Union is in its third week.

Police Chief Kermit Bailey said about 25 strikers were on the picket line when nonstriking workers arrived at the plant about 7 a.m.

Bailey said strikers used clubs and rocks and that several car windows were broken.

"We had three State Troopers to help us, and we got between them and made the four arrests," the chief said.

"After three cars were attacked and one man suffered a shoulder injury, we started waving the other workers' cars away," said Bailey.

He said the four arrested men were released on bond. He did not identify them.

TRUCKERS ADVISED TO SHUN NIGHT

Alabama State Troopers are advising truckers to drive only during daylight hours after shooting and rock throwing continued across the state yesterday.

"We are encouraging and advising driving during daylight hours only. Park them at night," Theresa Trotter, state police dispatcher in Birmingham, said.

That warning is being echoed by state troopers across the state, said Paula Weiss, a spokeswoman for the Department of Public Safety.

She said state troopers are keeping track of the violence during the independent truckers strike with the aid of local authorities who have been calling state troopers.

Meanwhile, Col. Byron Prescott, director of the state Department of Public Safety, said troopers would be supplemented by law enforcement officers from other state agencies in patrolling highways and interstates.

Officers from the state alcoholic beverage control board, conservation department, revenue department and the Public Service Commission will be patrolling with the troopers in marked and unmarked cars, Prescott said. They will have arrest powers.

"If incidents continue to escalate in number or violence, it could become necessary for this department to request additional manpower or assistance from other state departments and the Alabama National Guard," he said.

Lt. Roy Smith of the state troopers said last night there have been about 50 incidents since the strike began with two resulting in minor injuries.

These were reported yesterday:

Two trucks were shot at, but not hit, in Franklin County on Alabama 247 north of Red Bay at 6:26 p.m.

A trucker was stopped on U.S. 82 in Chilton County and threatened by four men in a black pickup truck about 4:30 p.m. A short time later two other trucks approached and were fired on by the occupants of the pickup.

Shots fired from a car hit the top of a feed truck trailer on Alabama 160 near Nectar at 6:34 p.m.

An object shattered the passenger window and part of the windshield of a truck traveling on U.S. 278, east of Alabama 79 interchange in Blount County at 8 p.m.

Two trucks were struck by objects thrown from a car in the opposite lane south of Tuscumbia on Alabama 247 at 6:26 p.m.

A truck was struck by a piece of metal thrown from a passing car on U.S. 278 in Hamilton at 5:28 p.m.

A truck was hit by gunfire on Interstate 65 near Warrior about 5 a.m. The driver was not injured, but the cab and trailer were damaged.

Cinder blocks were reported on Interstate 65 near an overpass in Morgan County about 2 a.m.

Rocks hit a truck about 1 a.m. on Interstate 65 between Morris and Kimberly.

Drivers reported rocks thrown at trucks about 12:05 a.m. on Interstate 20 near the Talladega-Calhoun county line.

A truck was struck by a rock south of Addison in Winston County at 1:30 p.m.

In Birmingham police are investigating the shooting of two trucks late Tuesday night.

Inspector B.R. Goforth said police have leads, but he did not wish to discuss specifics for fear of jeopardizing the investigation.

Goforth said Birmingham police would patrol near overpasses, exits and truck stops where they suspect trouble may occur.

Meanwhile, C.E. McBride, president of Colonial Fast Freight Lines, said the independent truckers strike is hurting the company he founded in 1942.

"We're practically shut down. Our income is completely shut off."

McBride said the 85 drivers who haul for his company are independent owner-operators. All 85 are staying off the roads.

McBride, 72, has laid off eight of his 12 employees during the strike. "We are in (financial) danger. If it's out too long, it will be questionable whether it will be worth it to start it back up again."

McBride also opposes the increased fuel tax and user fees, but he feels the strike will not be effective. He thinks lobbying in Washington, D.C., would be a better method.

"We're in complete sympathy with them, but they're going about it wrong."

Independent truckers are protesting the Surface Transportation Act of 1982 which will raise fuel taxes to 9 cents a gallon, from 4 cents, starting in April and increase user fees from $240 a year to $1,900 a year by 1989. The fee increases take effect July 1985.

Spokesmen for local wholesale grocers claim the strike has not affected them significantly.

An official of Western Supermarkets said, "We are not experiencing any problems at all. A few trucks have been late because they're not running at night."

A spokesman for Food Service Distributors Inc. said, "It's hard to tell directly. I've had one or two shipments held up, but I don't know if it was because of this."

Louis C. DiChiara, manager of City Wholesale Grocery Co., Inc. said, "It has not affected us yet. We have gotten all our shipments in on time. We got three in today (Wednesday). One trucker came in from Orlando and he said he didn't have any trouble.".

DiChiara said the company does receive large quantities of goods at the main terminals in Birmingham, which are then distributed by trucks. He said the strike could cause problems in distributing these goods, at any time.

BELL STRIKE: VANDALISM UP, SERVICE NORMAL

MONTGOMERY, AL.—Vandalism had inceased, but South Central Bell service was near normal as a nationwide strike of telephone workers entered the seventh day.

Tom Somerville, a spokesman for the telephone company, said Friday operations were being carried out with about 46 percent of the work force in Alabama.

"Over 90 percent of the operator-assisted calls are now being completed in comparision with 84 percent Monday, the first business day of the strike," he said.

But Somerville said there were reports of about a dozen acts of vandalism since the strike began, including Thursday's damage of a "carrier system," which knocked out long-distance service to 4,500 customers of an independent telephone company near Huntsville.

"That's about 10 times the normal volume of incidents of vandalism in Alabama," Somerville said.

He said about 400 Bell customers were affected when cables were cut in Opelika and Birmingham and cable connection boxes in Pelham, Montgomery and the Birmingham area were damaged.

But repair work was being handled in near normal fashion and work crews have been able to get around to some non-emergency work, he said.

[From the Huntsville [AL] Times, Aug. 14, 1983]

VANDALISM CUTS PHONE SERVICE

MONTGOMERY.—Acts of vandalism knocked out telephone service to 1,500 South Central Bell customers during the first week of a nationwide strike of telephone workers.

Tom Somerville, a spokesman for the telephone company, said four cable connection boxes were damaged in the Birmingham area on Friday, and 1,100 customers lost service for a short while.

Somerville said scattered reports of vandalism have increased since the Communications Workers of America went on strike last Sunday. A total of 1,500 South Central Bell customers have lost service because of damage to cables and cable connection boxes.

On Thursday, damage to a carrier system knocked out service to 4,500 customers of an independent telephone company near Huntsville.

CWA, the Telecommunications International Union and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers represent a total of 675,000 workers who struck the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. over wages, job security and working conditions.

Meanwhile, telephone operations were being carried out Friday with 46 percent of the work force in Alabama.

Somerville said over 93 percent of operator-assisted calls and 62 percent of the directory assistance calls were completed Friday.

BOND FOR ACCUSED STRIKING TRUCKER REVOKED

MOBILE.—A federal judge revoked the bond of a striking Teamster trucker accused of opening a truck valve that spilled 641 gallons of pesticide in a motel parking lot.

U.S. District Judge W. Brevard Hand ordered Larry Steven Barnes, 44, held without bond Tuesday after a prosecutor said he threatened a witness who allegedly reported the spill to authorities.

Barnes and Royce Allday, 55, were arrested Friday by FBI agents on a complaint charging them with willfully destroying property moving in interstate commerce.

The two Teamsters are accused of opening the valve of a Redwing Carriers Inc. truck on April 16, allowing nitrophenol, a poison to drain into the parking lot of the Red Roofs Inn.

Hand had temporarily revoked Barnes' bond Monday after a woman testified he made an alleged threat against the life of anyone implicating him in the spill.

Barnes has been held on a $15,000 bond since Friday.

Assistant U.S. Attorney E.T. Rolison told Hand Monday the bond should be denied. Barnes and Royce Allday, 55, were charged last Friday by the FBI with willfull destroying property moving in interstate commerce.

A tanker truck belonging to the strike-bound Redwing Co. of Creola was parked at a motel on Interstate 65 in Mobile when 641 gallons of pesticide, nitrophenol, was drained from it on April 16.

Company officials estimated the cost of cleaning up the spill at $750,000 to $1 million. The pesticide ran into a gaping drainage ditch, complicating the nine-day cleanup. The company posted $10,000 reward for an arrest and conviction in the case.

According to an FBI affidavit, Barnes told Frances Yonker that if anyone reported what he and Allday had done "they would be killed."

Barnes also asserted that "Teamsters stuck together," according to Ms. Yonker who testified during a preliminary hearing Monday.

Union drivers on April 15 launched a strike against Redwing in a dispute over wages.

Charges against Barnes and Allday carry maximum penalties of 10-year prison terms and fines of $5,000.

By Mr. STAFFORD:

S. 303. A bill to authorize certain smaller community activities to be undertaken by the Army Corps of Engineers; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

SMALLER COMMUNITIES WATER RESOURCES ASSISTANCE ACT

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, the smaller communities of our Nation confront a variety of needs, including many within the responsibility of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. I am today introducing legislation designed to ameliorate the situation for some of these communities, including ones in the State of Vermont.

I have had the honor to introduce each of these proposals during the 98th Congress. Each won approval of the Committee on Environment and Public Works. However, they failed to become law when we did not pass omnibus water resources legislation.

The initial provision in the bill seeks to improve the situation of ice buildup. Severe icing problems in many communities can produce flooding, when chunks of ice clog a river, backing water into city streets.

As just one example, in Hardwick, VT, ice buildup in the Lamoille River has backed the river flow into low-lying areas of the town almost every winter.

The citizens of Hardwick have developed an imaginative plan that would lessen that danger. With some support from the State of Vermont, the town in 1983 installed ice booms—tires strung on cable across the river. These booms collect ice above the town, lessening the likelihood that ice will pile up in the community to produce flooding.

The language that I am submitting today would assist the citizens of Hardwick by demonstrating this useful technique in a wider, more effective way. It will also enable the Corps of Engineers, on an ongoing basis, to assist other communities affiliated with the ice-flooding problem.

In the case of Hardwick, one issue has been the compatibility of the existing ice boom with the needs of white-water canoeists, once the spring breakup occurs.

The canoeists oppose any permanent structures in the river, and they want the ice boom removed as soon as possible each spring. The town and the canoeists have worked out a mutually acceptable position. The terms of my bill reflect that agreement. This demonstration project for Hardwick will in no way impede sports canoeing.

Section 3 of the bill authorizes the Army Corps of Engineers to undertake a program of technical assistance to many small communities where the capability exists to revive former industrial sites with new hydroelectric facilities.

Many of these old industrial sites, millraces, and similar facilities can be revived for new hydro use. This bill will enable the corps to offer technical advice to these communities. It will not pay for any of the actual facilities.

Finally, this bill will augment safety repair work at Waterbury Dam in Vermont. Work is underway to construct, for safety purposes, a new low-level outlet and related facilities at this dam. I applaud the corps for this work, designed to assure the continued integrity of Waterbury Dam.

Yet other repairs are necessary and are properly a Federal responsibility, particularly work on the concrete spillway, which is in disrepair. This bill would assure that such work can and will go forward. Once the safety of the dam and the spillway are assured, the State will, I understand, be willing to assume full responsibility for all future work on the dam.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 303

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Smaller Communities Water Resources Assistance Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. (a) The Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Secretary"), shall undertake a program of research for the control of river ice, and to assist communities in breaking up such ice, which otherwise is likely to cause or aggravate flood damage or severe streambank erosion.

(b) The Secretary is authorized further to provide technical assistance to local units of government, to implement local plans to control or break up river ice. As part of such authority, the Secretary shall acquire necessary ice-control or ice-breaking equipment that shall be loaned to local units of government together with operating assistance, where appropriate.

(c) For the purposes of Subsections (a) and (b) of this section, the sum of $5,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary in each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1986, through September 30, 1990, such sums to remain available until expended.

(d) To implement further the purposes of this section, the Secretary, in consultation and cooperation with local officials, is authorized and directed to undertake a demonstration program for the control of river ice at Hardwick, Vermont. The work authorized by this subsection shall be designed to minimize the danger of flooding due to ice problems in the vicinity of such community. In the design, construction, and location of ice-control structures for this project, full consideration will be given to the recreational, scenic, and environmental values of the reach of river affected by the project, in order to minimize project impacts on these values. Full opportunity shall be given to interested environmental and recreational organizations to participate in such planning. For the purposes of this subsection, the sum of $900,000 is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, or thereafter, such sum to remain available until expended.

(e) No later than March 1, 1988, the Secretary shall report to the Congress on activities under this section.

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary shall, upon the request of local public officials, survey the potential and methods for rehabilitating former industrial sites, millraces, and similar types of facilities already constructed for use as hydroelectric facilities. The Secretary shall, upon request, provide technical assistance to local public agencies, including electric cooperatives, in designing projects to rehabilitate sites that have been surveyed, or are qualified for survey, under this section.

(b) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary, to implement this section, the sum of $5,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1986, through September 30, 1990, such sums to remain available until expended.

SEC. 4. The Waterbury, Vermont, project in the Winooski River Basin, authorized for modification in section 10 of the 1944 Flood Control Act, approved as Public Law 78-534 of December 22, 1944, is hereby further modified to provide that any major rehabilitation of such project, including restoration of the concrete spillway of such dam, shall be undertaken by the Secretary. Nothing in this section shall be construed as altering the conditions established in the Federal Power Commission license numbered 2090, issued on September 16, 1954.●

By Mr. DOMENICI (for himself and Mr. BINGAMAN):

S. 304. A bill for the transfer of certain interests in lands in Socorro County, NM to the New Mexico Institute of Mining & Technology, Socorro, NM; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN LANDS TO THE NEW MEXICO INSTITUTE OF MINING AND TECHNOLOGY

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, today I introduce legislation that will convey some 8,278.39 acres of land currently under the control of the Bureau of Land Management to the New Mexico Institute of Mining & Technology located at Socorro, NM.

The purpose of the transfer is to provide this university with enough land so that valuable educational, research, and testing work done at this university can continue and expand to meet growing needs in both New Mexico and the Nation.

The legislation is a very simple land transfer which contains language which will revert the land back to the U.S. Government if it is not used for the purposes set forth in the legislation. Further the university agrees to pay a $2.50 an acre administrative charge to assist with costs associated with the transfer. The legislation reserves to the Federal Government any mineral rights associated with the land. I am aware of the fact that representatives of the university have been working diligently with grazing permitees in an effort to minimize any hardship this transfer may entail.

The transfer is important for the university, for New Mexico, and for our Nation. The New Mexico Institute of Mining & Technology is located in Socorro in the Rio Grande Valley some 75 miles south of Albuquerque. Founded as the School of Mines of territorial New Mexico, the intervening years have been the development of a highly technical college and noted research center. The school is comprised of a small college—some 1,300 undergraduate and graduate students—plus three other divisions—the State of New Mexico Bureau of Mines and Mineral Resources, the New Mexico Petroleum Recovery Research Center, and the Research and Development Division.

The Bureau of Mines is the official State agency responsible for original investigations and recommendations concerning the development of New Mexico's mineral and energy resources. The Petroleum Recovery Research Center is the newest of Tech's division. Since its establishment in 1975, the center has gained international prominence for its studies on new and improved methods of recovering oil and gas.

The Research and Development Division supports research throughout New Mexico Tech and operates a number of geophysical laboratories including a new center for explosive technology research and terminal effects research and analysis [TERA].

TERA expertise centers on experimental development, evaluation, and analysis of system components intended for use by the U.S. Government. In recent years, the spread of our Nation's cities has made it increasingly difficult for Federal laboratories and project offices to carry out certain types of research and development activities onsite. As a consequence, TERA has assumed more of the testing work which is required to fulfill many Govenment individual missions. The land under question meets several requirements. Importantly it is contiguous to the present laboratory and is thus well situated in terms of physical needs, it will allow for economies of operation that might otherwise not exist in a location further removed from the existing facilities and will provide for a longer testing range.

As a State institution of higher education the New Mexico Institute of Mining and Technology [NMIMT] is fully committed to the preservation of the environment and the ecology of the State of New Mexico and of the Nation. NMIMT is nationally recognized for its mine reclamation work in the San Juan Basin of New Mexico, and for its environmental chemistry research on New Mexico's streams and rivers. The NMIMT Safety Committee, which reports directly to the president of the institute, reviews all procedures and land usage within the institute involving potential damage to the environment. This review process assures that institute activities are consistent with the State of New Mexico Environmental Improvement Division regulations, as well as the U.S. EPA regulations. The planned activities for the requested land will involve, at most, limited, short-term effects on the ecosystem. Any damage to the land will be reversed to the extent practical using standard reclamation techniques.

Currently a number of groups are working with the university on this project and I hope the Congress can act quickly on this legislation to allow this important research to go forth.●

By Mr. GOLDWATER (for himself and Mr. DENTON):

S. 305. A bill to repeal the War Powers Resolution; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPEAL OF WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, together with Senator DENTON, I am introducing a bill to repeal the War Powers Resolution. The biggest mistake any Congress could ever make would be to become convinced that it has exclusive or primary control over tactical military decisions and that Congress alone can give the order to go to war or make peace, something the Constitutional Fathers were careful to prevent.

The War Powers Resolution would have prevented Franklin Roosevelt from taking courageous action prior to a declaration of war against Nazi Germany, action which probably saved Great Britain and the resistance in Europe from total annihilation.

The War Powers Resolution would have halted Andrew Jackson from moving his army into Spanish-occupied Florida and blocked the contribution of his military mission to American expansion.

And it would have denied Thomas Jefferson authority to protect American shipping against pirate attacks by the barbary powers, just to name a few instances in history when important defensive action would have been illegal under the War Powers Resolution.

Mr. President, in my opinion, the statute is unconstitutional. But in order to avoid uncertainty or hesitation at a moment when an immediate defensive reaction is required, I believe we should repeal the measure now. We may never have a definitive court decision on the issues because the judicial branch usually finds a way to duck political questions.

The War Powers Resolution attempts to deny flexibility to the President in the defense of American citizens and their freedoms. Even if it were not unconstitutional, it is impractical, and dangerous.

Not only does the statute restrict the engagement of U.S. military forces beyond 60 days, without a declaration of war, but it claims that Congress can order the President to remove military forces sooner than 60 days from any such hostility. Under the provisions of the resolution, Congress can technically direct the withdrawal of American forces from hostilities within an hour after the President has deployed them, assuming Congress is in session and chooses to act with such speed.

What the statute does is to encourage this country's adversaries to take action harmful to the vital interests of the American people in the belief that the President will be unable to carry out a sustained response to foreign threats.

The War Powers Resolution is a modern day invention that lacks any support in the Constitution or our history. It runs directly opposite to the practical experience gained by the Founding Fathers during the War of Independence when impediments erected by the Continental Congress nearly lost the cause of liberty.

The framers of the Constitution, who met in Philadelphia in 1787, knew this for a fact. They were aware from first-hand knowledge that the Continental Congress, acting under supreme military powers vested in it by the Articles of Confederation, had changed and disrupted General Washington's plans time after time with disastrous effects. The framers wanted to correct this situation and that is one reason why they designated the President as Commander in Chief.

To get at the intent of the framers, we will have to put ourselves in their setting. We will have to see things as they did. Looking through their eyes, we would see an American people faced by great military dangers, both immediately and in the future.

In 1787 the United States was surrounded by hostile forces. Spain controlled the mouth of the Mississippi and the Floridas and blocked free U.S. navigation of the river to American trade. Spain plotted to erect a hostile Indian nation between its possessions on the American mainland and the territories of the Thirteen Original United States.

To the north, Britain still occupied military forts on American soil in direct violation of the Treaty of Paris of 1783. Like Spain, Great Britain incited Indian raids across the borders of the United States.

Even our recent ally, France, looked upon the United States as little more than a dependent client. France sought to draw the United States into its own foreign conflicts.

Also, something we forget today is that in 1787, when the Constitution was drafted, U.S. trade was already reaching all corners of the globe. In fact, John Jay commented in the Federalist Paper No. 4 that the U.S. people may find themselves drawn into a military conflict far away from our borders because our shipping was active in places as distant as China and India.

How could the new Government of the United States cope with these problems and face up to its obligations to protect Americans at home and wherever they may be in the world? One answer the framers provided was national unity under a stronger Federal Government. But this was not a complete answer. In order to safely meet the needs of the new nation, the framers knew it was necessary to vest all the executive power of the Government in a single officer, the President.

Executive power includes the defense power. From the 18th century to the 1970's, President after President made the decision of when and where the military forces would be used. In fact, my office has cataloged over 200 instances in which U.S. Presidents, acting without any declarations of war, ordered American military units to engage in hostilities outside the United States in the defense of our citizens and freedoms.

When Congress suddenly changed course in the early 1970's and began to assert for itself control over military decisionmaking, it brought humiliation upon this country and severely damaged our position in the world. Congressionally legislated restrictions led directly to the total collapse of South Vietnam, to genocide in Cambodia, and to the loss of a neutral Laos. Soviet sponsored aggression in Ethiopia, Angola, and Nicaragua and the Soviet invasion into Afghanistan stem in part form the perception of the Russian leaders that the United States has become so weakened by congressional restraints that we no longer have the ability or will to meet serious challenges while they remain manageable.

Mr. President, I suggested earlier that we should test the War Powers Resolution against history. Let us take just one example. What would have happened if President Franklin Roosevelt had been bound by the War Powers Resolution before the official entry of the United States into World War II?

Historians have discovered in recently uncensored materials that the independent and often secret actions of President Roosevelt enabled the United States to keep alive necessary foreign opposition to Nazi Germany before war was declared.

For example, Congress was not consulted when President Roosevelt sent American troops to occupy bases in Greenland and Iceland in 1941 and ordered them to cooperate with British Armed Forces already present there. Nazi planes overflew these bases and no one knew whether or when a German attack was coming. It was clearly a hostile situation.

Would Congress have extended President Roosevelt's authority to keep American marines on these islands after 60 days, as would have been required by the War Powers Resolution? I think not. Remember, Congress had renewed the military draft in 1940 by the slim margin of a single vote.

Mr. President, I might also ask whether Congress would have consented to President Roosevelt's action in September 1941 when he ordered American warships to escort and protect British convoys west of Iceland and to destroy German submarines on sight. Again, the answer is surely "No," Congress would not have voted to continue his military action.

Or, would Congress have authorized President Roosevelt's action in May 1941, when he secretly lent long-range U.S. amphibian planes to Great Britain and assigned 80 of our Navy airmen to help in British operations to sink the German battleship, Bismarck? Again, the answer must be "No."

The fact is that if the War Powers Resolution had been on the books in the early 1940's President Roosevelt could not have kept troops in Greenland, he could not have reinforced the marines on Iceland, he could not have escorted British shipping in the Atlantic and he could not have taken any of the many bold actions which prevented a total collapse of resistance to Nazi Germany. The War Powers Resolution would have brought a total disaster to the democracies had it been in effect in the 1940's.

Mr. President, the point of my little review of history is that a President must have flexibility to resist challenges to our freedom in the early stages. The American people cannot rely on an often reluctant and divided Congress to act soon enough in every crisis to deal effectively with every threat against our Nation. The framers of the Constitution understood this fact. They recognized that the ultimate decision for the defense of American freedoms must rest with the Nation's Commander in Chief.

This is not to say that there are no checks on the President. The President does not inherit his position. He must be elected by the people. He must stand for reelection if he wishes to have a second term.

He must get Senate approval for appointments of executive officers and he must come to Congress for defense appropriations. Ultimately, there is the check of impeachment if Congress determines the President has abused his constitutional powers.

And, I would point out that every President knows it is the sovereign people who retain the reins of powers. Yet, the President has the sworn duty to "preserve, protect, and defend" the Constitution. He has the right and responsibility to judge how to defend the Nation as he believes best.

Mr. President, whether it is unconstitutional, as I believe, or unwise barrier to American security, the War Powers Resolution should be repealed and that is why we are introducing this bill today.●

By Mr. BURDICK:

S. 307. A bill amending the conveyance of property to Mountrail County Park Commission, North Dakota, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

MOUNTRAIL COUNTY PARK COMMISSION, NORTH DAKOTA

● Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, in section 44 of Public Law 93-251 (88 Stat. 12), a small tract of federally owned land along Lake Sakakawea in North Dakota was conveyed to the Mountrail County Park Commission through the Army Corps of Engineers to maintain a park for public use and recreation. The site covered part of a town that had been leveled for the Garrison Dam Reservoir, but that area was declared in excess of what was finally required.

The Mountrail County Park Commission upgraded the primitive camping site by filling in the remains of basements, removing rubble, and planting vegetation to create an attractive park area. In addition, it has added many improvements such as a wash and bath house, access road, boat ramp, fish cleaning facility, and covered picnic shelters.

The park commission generates revenue for the park from space rental agreements. A small portion of the rental space has been set aside for lease to individuals for long-term advanced reserved parking arrangements from May through September. Lease agreements are reviewed and signed on an annual basis. A number of campers trailers, and wooden structures are located on these rental units on a year-round basis for use by their owners as weekend retreats.

The Omaha Division of the Corps of Engineers has notified the park commission that they consider the long-term parking of such vehicles a violation of the original conveyance. The trailer owners understand that the structures are not permanent and that they must be removed at the owner's expense if asked to do so by the park commission. All parties involved agree that remedial legislation is necessary to clarify the issue. The legislation introduced today allows such leasing to be carried out under the authority of the park commission. It also provides for reimbursement at fair market value by the park commission to the Federal Government for that portion of the land.

I would urge the adoption of this legislation so that the park commission, which has worked so diligently to build up a facility, will be provided full management authority it needs to obtain necessary revenues, and thus to continue its fine service to the public.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 44 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-251, 88 Stat. 12) is amended by striking subsection (b)(2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) The lands conveyed pursuant to this section, including the Olson Second Addition, shall be used by the Mountrail County Park Commission, Mountrail County, North Dakota, for public park and recreation purposes: Provided, That the park commission may designate a portion of the lands conveyed for leasing of cabin sites. The Mountrail County Park Commission shall reimburse the Federal Government for lands used at the fair market value for such property. If any lands used for public purposes are ever used for any other purpose, title thereto shall revert to, and become the property of, the United States which shall have the right of immediate entry thereof.

By Mr. HART:

S. 308. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to reduce the deduction for business meals and to earmark the savings from such reduction for the school lunch programs; to the Committee on Finance.

ESTABLISHING A SCHOOL LUNCH TRUST FUND FROM REDUCTIONS IN BUSINESS MEALS

Mr. HART. Mr. President, one need not look far in our society to find examples of inequity and unfairness. But few examples are more palpable than the allocation of federally subsidized meals. Over the past 2 years, while we have cut over $1 billion from the National School Lunch Program, we continue to subsidize business meals at a cost of several hundred million dollars a year. This perverse policy is not only wasteful, it is also unjust. In depriving millions of schoolchildren of basic needs such as nutrition, we are harming our young people, our greatest national resource.

Today, I am reintroducing legislation to remedy this inequity by amending the Tax Code to reduce the deduction for business meals and entertainment expenses by 30 percent, with the savings, as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, earmarked for the National School Lunch Program. Passage of this bill, which will leave no impact on the Federal budget, will significantly bring school lunch funding in line with that which existed prior to the fiscal year 1981 Federal budget. This bill is similar to legislation I introduced in the 98th Congress.

This measure would not eliminate or abolish the business meals deduction. It merely reduces from 100 percent to 70 percent the allowable deduction for business meals and entertainment expenses, to provide for greater Federal support of school nutrition.

The national school lunch program was created "to safeguard the health and well-being of the Nation's children." The program provides pre-elementary, and secondary schools with cash and commodities, so that schoolchildren can receive nutritious lunches. Over 80 percent of the program's expenditures go to support free and reduced-price meals for low-income children. Currently, the National School Lunch Program assists 23 million schoolchildren in over 91,000 schools—nearly half of whom are from poor families.

Since its inauguration, the Reagan administration has taken it upon itself to cripple the program. In fiscal year 1982, the administration cut funding for all child nutrition programs by $1.5 billion—that figure represented more than a third of all child nutrition funding. Most prominent among these cuts was a $1 billion cut in the National School Lunch Program, a decrease in funding of 35 percent. Cutbacks were achieved through reducing benefits for moderate-income students, lowering income eligibility guidelines for free and reduced-price meal participants, and raising the cost of reduced-price meals to the individual student from 20 cents to 40 cents.

In its fiscal year 1983 budget, the administration proposed over $400 million in school lunch cuts. Fortunately, the Congress rebuffed the administrations's proposals. Through the budget process of that year, all child nutrition programs received funding to meet current expenditures, including increases for inflation. The Congress also rejected the administration's proposed fiscal year 1984 cuts in these programs. As a member of the Senate Budget Committee, I am pleased that on a bipartisan basis, the Senate had the good sense to preserve the national school lunch program against further encroachment.

The fiscal year 1982 cuts have severely reduced the possibilities of many of our Nation's schoolchildren to receive at least one nutritious meal per day. Since 1981, over 3 million children have left the school lunch program. The decline is due in large part to a decrease in free and reduced-price meals, of benefit mainly to poor children. Over 1 million fewer poor children are now receiving free and reduced-price lunches as compared to when the Reagan administration took office.

The decline in student participation has been accompanied by a fall-off in school participation, as reduced student volume raises unit costs for the whole program at each school, forcing some school districts to drop out of the program entirely. Over 2,700 schools dropped out of the program between March 1981 and March 1982. Moreover, the number of States that supplemented Federal school lunch reimbursements dropped from 17 in 1980-81 to 13 in 1981-82. At the same time, over 500,000 children and 1,100 schools have left the School Breakfast Program.

Unwilling to comb intelligently the entire mix of Federal taxing and spending policies for ways to curb the deficit, the Reagan administration focused its ax on child nutrition programs, seemingly unaware that future cuts in this area have major effect on the health and welfare of many of our Nation's poorest schoolchildren. We have work to do in restoring the school lunch program to its pre-cutback levels.

The benefits of the school lunch program to the health and welfare of our Nation's young people are well-documented. In cutting funds for these programs, we are restricting opportunities for all of us who might benefit from the contributions made by well-nourished, healthy people to our society. As the nutritionist Dr. Jean Mayer put it: "Of all the dumb ways of saving money, not feeding kids is the dumbest."

Numerous studies have shown that the National School Lunch Program provides emotional as well as nutritional benefits for schoolchildren, and that it enhances the ability of children to perform well in school. A study by the Food Research and Action Center found that students who eat school lunches are much more likely to consume milk, a fruit, and a vegetable than students who attended schools that dropped the National School Lunch Program. Students participating in the National School Lunch Program had more of their nutritional needs fulfilled than those students who did not participate. A study by Dr. Barry Popkin, of the University of North Carolina, found that children of all ages benefit nutritionally from the school lunch and breakfast programs, particularly in the consumption of those foods traditionally slighted by young people.

Finally, the Agriculture Department's recently released "National Evaluation of School Nutrition Programs" demonstrates that children of all ages and incomes benefit nutritionally from the school breakfast and lunch programs. Clearly, the National School Lunch Program fulfills a most fundamental need for many of our Nation's schoolchildren. A hungry child, a malnourished child, is hardly able to think, to create, to concentrate on the lessons in the classroom.

Cuts in the National School Lunch Program were made in the name of fiscal austerity. Yet, while our poorest children are forced to tighten their belts—or give them up altogether—American business men and women continue to have the costs of luxury meals subsidized by the U.S. Treasury. Under existing law, business meals and entertainment expenses are fully deductible as ordinary and necessary operating expenses.

The arguments against this subsidy are well known. The Senate has heard them many times before. It is expensive. The Joint Committee on Taxation estimates that the Treasury will forgo in lost revenue, $1.8 billion in fiscal year 1985 from tax deduction for business meals other than those associated with travel. It is inefficient, inflationary, and wasteful. The deduction helps drive up the cost of meals, and is given for meals that people would eat anyway. Finally, it is unfair. Selected members of the business community are allowed to enjoy themselves at public expense.

Such unfairness might be overlooked in times of prosperity. But at a time when infant mortality is on the rise, when families are forced to choose between food and clothes and rent—such unfairness is unconscionable.

If this deduction were reduced—if 30 percent of the deduction were disallowed, as this bill would require—the Treasury would collect in increased revenue over $1.1 billion in fiscal year 1986. If this increased revenue were earmarked for the National School Lunch Program, we would make great strides toward restoring the program to pre-cutback levels.

What would this increased money provide? We could, first of all, restore the reduced price meal reimbursement to 20 cents. We could also restore the free and reduced price eligibility levels close to those that existed in 1981 for the school lunch program.

The free meal eligibility criteria is currently tied to food stamp eligibility; 130 percent of the poverty level or $12,090 for a family of four. The reduced price eligibility is currently 185 percent of the poverty level, or $17,210 for a family of four. Funding for the National School Lunch Program should be increased sufficiently to set the free meal eligibility at 125 percent of the poverty level plus $85 for an indexed monthly standard deduction. The reduced price eligibility level should be set at 195 percent of the poverty level plus $85 for an indexed monthly standard deduction. These changes would provide assistance for the 3 million children no longer participating in the National School Lunch Program.

Mr. President, this bill stands for a simple reassessment of national priorities. It says, in effect, that nutritionally balanced meals for our poorest children in our Nation's schools should take precedence over expense account meals in private clubs and fancy restaurants. It says that, at a time when all claims upon the public purse cannot be realized, equity and fairness must win out. My former colleague, Philip Hart, the Senator from Michigan, stated well the best reasons for supporting child nutrition programs:

> A child whose brain is damaged or whose growth is stunted because of a poor diet faces a life of dependency and poverty. If the moral considerations of taking every possible step to prevent such damages are not compelling enough, then cost cutters should at least consider the cost to future generations of lost earnings capacities and perhaps, public assistance.

In supporting this bill, the Congress will be acting to protect future generations. Ours is not a secure society when millions of children—future contributors to national excellence in the arts and the sciences, business, politics, and the classroom—go to bed hungry. This bill outlines a different future for our Nation and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a full copy of this bill be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 308

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. REDUCTION IN BUSINESS MEAL DEDUCTION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Paragraph (1) of section 274(e) (relating to business meals) is amended by striking out "Expenses" and inserting in lieu thereof "70 percent of the expenses".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1984.

SEC. 2. NATIONAL SCHOOL LUNCH TRUST FUND.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT.—There is established in the Treasury of the United States a trust fund, to be known as the National School Lunch Trust Fund (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "Trust Fund"), consisting of such amounts as are transferred to the Trust Fund under subsection (b)(1) and any interest earned on investment of amounts in the Trust Fund under subsection (c)(2).

(b) TRANSFERS TO TRUST FUND.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of the Treasury shall transfer to the Trust Fund an amount equal to the revenues from the business meal deduction reduction.

(2) REVENUES FROM THE BUSINESS MEAL DEDUCTION REDUCTION.—The term "revenues from the business meal deduction reduction" means, for any fiscal year, the amount which the Secretary estimates to be the excess of—

(A) the gross revenues received in the Treasury of the United States for such fiscal year, over

(B) the gross revenues which would have been received for such fiscal year if the amendment made by section 1(a) had not been enacted into law.

(3) METHOD OF TRANSFER.—The amounts required to be transferred to the Trust Fund under paragraph (1) shall be transferred at least quarterly from the general fund of the Treasury to the Trust Fund on the basis of estimates made by the Secretary of the Treasury. Proper adjustment shall be made in the amounts subsequently transferred to the extent prior estimates were in excess of or less than the amounts required to be transferred.

(c) MANAGEMENT OF TRUST FUND.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to hold the Trust Fund and (after consultation with the Secretary BAD MAG TAPE  of Agriculture) to report to the Congress each year on the financial condition and the results of the operations of the Trust Fund during the preceding fiscal year and on its expected condition and operation during the next fiscal year. Such report shall be printed as both a House and Senate document of the session of the Congress to which the report is made.

(2) INVESTMENTS.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest such portion of the Trust Fund as is not, in the Secretary's judgment, required to meet current withdrawals. Such investments may be made only in interest-bearing obligations of the United States or in obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States. For such purpose, such obligations may be acquired (i) on original issue at the issue price, or (ii) by purchase of outstanding obligations at the market price. The purchase for which obligations of the United States may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act are hereby extended to authorize the issuance at par of special obligations exclusively to the Trust Fund. Such special obligations shall bear interest at a rate equal to the average rate of interest, computed as to the end of the calendar month next preceding the date of such issue, borne by all marketable interest-bearing obligations of the United States then forming a part of the public debt; except that where such average rate is not a multiple of one-eighth of 1 percent, the rate of interest of such special obligations shall be the multiple of one-eighth of 1 percent next lower than such average rate. Such special obligations shall be issued only if the Secretary of the Treasury determines that the purchase of other interest-bearing obligations of the United States, or of obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States on original issue or at the market price, is not in the public interest.

(B) SALE OF OBLIGATION.—Any obligation acquired by the Trust Fund (except special obligations issued exclusively to the Trust Fund) may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury at the market price, and such special obligations may be redeemed at par plus accrued interest.

(C) INTEREST.—The interest on, and the proceeds from the sale or redemption of, any obligations held in the Trust Fund shall be credited to and form a part of the Trust Fund.

(d) USE OF FUNDS.—For each of the fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1985, there is appropriated, out of any amounts in the Trust Fund, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the programs established under the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966.

By Mr. PROXMIRE (for himself, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. CRANSTON):

S. 309. A bill to amend the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act to better protect the environment and man from the hazards of pesticides, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

FEDERAL INSECTICIDE, FUNGICIDE, AND RODENTICIDE REFORM ACT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today with Senators HARKIN, METZENBAUM, LEAHY, and CRANSTON, I am introducing the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Reform Act. This bill is identical to S. 1774 which I introduced during the last Congress and is supported by a coalition of over 30 major farm, environmental, labor, and church groups.

The bill tightens existing law yet imposes no new programs or costs on either farmers or pesticide producers. Instead, it refines existing law and responds to its biggest deficiencies—lack of adequate health and safety data and lack of standards for granting exemptions from pesticide law requirements.

Why do we need a complete overhaul of the pesticides program? The answer is simple. The present program is dangerous to public health and safety.

According to a 1982 report of the House Agriculture Committee's Subcommittee on Department Operations, Research, and Foreign Agriculture, despite supposedly tough Federal pesticide laws, over 60 percent of major pesticides have not been tested for their potential to cause cancer. Over 90 percent of pesticides now in use have not been tested for their potential to cause genetic mutations and at least 70 percent of major pesticides in use have never been tested for their potential to cause birth defects.

Has the program improved since 1982? Not much. A recent study by the House Committee on Government Operations, "Problems Plague the Environmental Protection Agency's Pesticide Registration Activities," indicates that the pesticides program may have actually deteriorated since the first report.

In fact, between April 1981 and March 1984 EPA initiated no new rebuttable presumption against registration actions designed to restrict or ban use of the most potentially hazardous registered pesticides.

To make matters worse EPA reduced by three-fourths the staff assigned to this most important task.

While EPA has beefed up its program in the past six months, recent actions to control a handful of chemicals do not offset the basic weaknesses of current law such as pesticides registered with faulty data, untested pesticides in our food and drinking water, inadequate testing procedures and lack of worker safety standards.

Several parts of the bill are especially important. Chief among them is the section which closes the most serious loophole in existing law—the lack of reliable current health and safety data. This is a particular problem with respect to older pesticides, some dating back to the 1940's, which were registered before the 1972 Pesticides Act tightened data requirements. Reregistration of all old pesticides under the new standards was clearly the intent of the 1972 act, yet the policy was never implemented. In fact by 1983 less than 1 percent of all pesticides had been reregistered to conform to modern scientific knowledge.

My bill also closes a number of loopholes in the statute, including the abuse of emergency provisions contained in sections 18 and 24 of the current law which are often used to circumvent the requirements of the act. Not every situation can be an emergency and this bill provides a means to limit these exceptions.

The bill also makes it easier to remove from the market those pesticides registered on the basis of fraudulent data.

Finally, the bill expands public access to decisionmaking and limits use of secret, confidential data in EPA's pesticide registration process.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill, a basic explanation of its provisions, and a list of supporting groups be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(1) in paragraph (2)(A)—

(A) by striking out "shall revise" in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "may revise";

(2) amending subsection 6(c)(2)(B) to read as follows:

"(B) ADDITIONAL DATA TO SUPPORT EXISTING REGISTRATION.—

"(i) If the Administrator determines, pursuant to section 3(g) or otherwise, that additional data are required to maintain in effect an existing registration of a pesticide product (or a category of products) containing a particular active ingredient, the Administrator shall notify all existing registrants of the pesticide to which the determination relates and publish a list of such registrants and of such data requirements in the Federal Register. The notice shall specify the data required, the date by which the data shall be submitted, and the procedure for obtaining rulings by the Administrator on questions concerning the applicability of the notice to various registrants or concerning the nature of the data required to be submitted.

"(ii) Each registrant of such a pesticide product to whom the notice is applicable shall provide evidence within 120 days after receipt of the notification specified in clause (i) of this subparagraph that it is taking the appropriate steps prescribed by the Administrator to secure the required data. If more than one registrant is subject to the notice, such steps shall include entering into a joint data development arrangement, unless the registrants subject to the notice unanimously agree otherwise. The joint data developers shall furnish to the Administrator the name, address, and telephone number of the person to whom inquiries concerning the arrangement should be addressed. As an initial cost of participation the joint data developers shall divide equally 25 percent of the estimated total cost of producing the required data or each shall pay $100,000, whichever is less. The balance of the cost of producing the data shall be paid by the joint data developers as needed, and shall be shared by each joint data developer on the basis of its United States market participation for the pesticide being tested, based on total pounds of active ingredient equivalent sold or used annually. Each joint data developer's market participation shall be adjusted during the period of the data development so that the most recent sales figures are used to compute each member's market share for the purpose of determining its share of the remaining cost of producing the required data. Each of the joint data developers shall submit adequate evidence of its annual market participation to an independent auditor for each of the years during the period of the joint data development. Such independent auditor shall be chosen by the joint data developers. The auditor's decisions and determinations shall be final and binding on each of the joint data developers. If further data are required by the Administrator under this paragraph, either before or after the additional data that were originally requested have been submitted, the same formula and procedure specified in this paragraph shall apply as if the subsequent request were the initial request for data. Any registrant who shares in the cost of producing the data shall be entitled to receive a copy of the data, and to examine and rely upon such data in support of maintenance of such registration.

"(iii) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, if a registrant who is subject to the notice from the Administrator, within the 120-day period prescribed in clause (ii) of this subparagraph, fails to enter into a joint data development arrangement under that clause, or fails to take appropriate steps to secure and submit the required data, or fails to comply with the terms of a joint data development arrangement, the Administrator shall issue a notice of intent to suspend such registrant's registration of the pesticide for which additional data are required. The Administrator may include in the notice of intent to suspend such provisions as the Administrator deems appropriate concerning the continued sale and use of existing stocks of such pesticide. Any suspension proposed under this subparagraph shall become final and effective at the end of 30 days from receipt by the registrant of the notice of intent to suspend, unless during that time a request for hearing is made by a person adversely affected by the notice, or the registrant has satisfied the Administrator that the registrant has complied fully with the requirements that served as a basis for the notice of intent to suspend. If a hearing is requested, a hearing shall be conducted under section 6(d) of this Act. The only matters for resolution at that hearing shall be whether the Administrator had a valid and reasonable basis for requiring the additional data, whether the registrant has failed to take the action that served as the basis for the notice of intent to suspend the registration of the pesticide product for which additional data is required, and whether the Administrator's determination with respect to the disposition of existing stocks is consistent with this Act. If a hearing is held, a determination shall be made within 75 days after receipt of a request for such hearing, and the decision made after completion of such hearing shall be final. Any registration suspended under this subparagraph shall be reinstated by the Administrator if the Administrator determines that the registrant has complied fully with the requirements that served as a basis for the suspension of the registration.

"(vi) With respect to any study which has been or is being performed in response to a request for additional data issued under this subparagraph between September 30, 1978, and the date of enactment of the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Reform Act, any person who on such date of enactment is the registrant of a product of the type to which that request applies but who is not already a party to an agreement to share in the cost of performing that study shall be entitled to enter into a joint data development arrangement with any person or group which is performing or has performed that study, under which arrangement such person shall have the rights and duties of a joint data developer as follows: In the case where a study is being performed by two or more persons under a joint data development agreement, a registrant who wishes to avail himself of the rights provided by the clause shall be bound by the terms of such agreement; and in all other cases, a registrant who wishes to avail himself of the rights provided by this clause shall share in the cost of producing the data as provided in clause (iv) of this subparagraph and shall be subject to the provisions of clause (iii) of this subparagraph: Provided, That any registrant who wishes to be availed of the rights provided by this clause shall, not later than 120 days after date of enactment of the National Pesticide Hazard Prevention Act, submit an irrevocable offer to enter into such an arrangement to the person or group which is performing or has performed the study.".

BRIEF EXPLANATION OF THE "FEDERAL INSECTICIDE, FUNGICIDE, AND RODENTICIDE REFORM ACT"

Section 1 contains the title of the bill. Section 2 states that all amendments altering an existing statute refer to the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA), unless otherwise specified.

Section 3 contains several changes in definition of basic terms in FIFRA. An additional clause is added to the definition of "active ingredient," stating that the definition shall include an ingredient of a pesticide which will endanger human beings. The primary intent of this change is to allow the Administrator to require data on inert ingredients, to consider potential adverse impacts from inert ingredients in reading regulatory decisions under FIFRA, to list inert ingredients on the label, and to state and enforce pesticide use restrictions specified because of the potential toxicit of inert ingredients. (Several other sections of the "Pesticide Hazard Prevention Act" contain other amendments to FIFRA clarifying how specific provisions of FIFRA shall apply to inert ingredients.)

Section 3 also changes the definitions of "certified," "private," and "commercial" applicators. In all three cases, a clause is eliminated that allows a certified applicator to "supervise the use of" a restricted use pesticide applied by another person. The definition specifying what it means to apply a restricted use pesticide "under the direct supervision of a certified applicator" is deleted. Accordingly, all applicators of restricted use pesticides must be certified under the provisions of section 4 of FIFRA.

The definition of "ingredient statement," which must appear on pesticide labels, is extended to include the name of toxic inert ingredient, in addition to the name and percentage of active ingredients. The definition does not require the percentage of each inert ingredient to be specified in order to help protect from potential competitors the exact formula of pesticide products.

The definition of "unreasonable adverse effects on the environment," the basic standard governing nearly all regulatory decisions under FIFRA, is changed by deleting references to adverse effects on man. The "adverse impacts" standard would still apply to environmental impacts. Elsewhere in this Act, a "will endanger human health" standard is specified for adverse effects on man.

A definition of the term "data gap" is added to the statute. A "data gap" exists when a data requirement prescribed by the Administrator applicable to a given active ingredient or pesticide product has not been satisfied by pesticide registrants through submission of a valid study which has been conducted according to an experimental design judged to be acceptable in response to the data requirement. The definition also specified the criteria the Administrator shall apply in judging whether a given study satisfies a data requirement. These include the study protocols, documentation of the conduct and analysis of the study, and the results of the study.

Section 4 contains a number of extensive amendments to section 3 of FIFRA. Section 4(a)(1) of this Act alters the provision stating the Administrator "shall revise" the guidelines specifying what data shall be required in support of a registration to "may revise." This change is intended to grant the Administrator greater discretion. A provision is added which clarifies what information the Administrator shall require in support of pesticide registrations. "Pursuant to the standards of this Act," the Administrator shall require sufficient information to assess the risks and benefits of pesticides. Such data requirements shall be applied uniformly and consistently to the extent practicable. Waivers or variation in data requirements may be granted only if the advisability of the waiver or variation is clearly established, taking into account public comments received pursuant to a notice proposing such an action. The term "he" is replaced throughout this paragraph by "the Administrator."

Subsection 4(a)(1)(D) of this Act changes the provisions of FIFRA pertaining to the disclosure of information submitted to the Administrator in support of a pesticide registration. Under current law, the Administrator is required within 30 days of granting a registration to make available to the public, subject to the provisions of section 10 of FIFRA, the data submitted by registrants relevant to the registration actions. This Act establishes elsewhere a 90 day comment period after receipt of an application for registration of a pesticide containing a new active ingredient or a changed use pattern of previously registered active ingredient. Section 4(a)(1)(D) of this Act specifies that the Administrator shall make available to the public in an expeditious manner the data submitted in support of such registration applications, or petitions to establish tolerances. Hence, data would be disclosable subject to the provisions of section 10 prior to granting registrations or establishing tolerances during the period the Administrator is evaluating the pertinent applications.

Subsection 4(a)(2) of this Act contains a substantial rewrite of section 3(c)(2)(B) of FIFRA. The amendment is substantially identical to the language contained in H.R. 5203, the bill which passed the House August 11, 1982. This section of FIFRA specifies the procedures and provisions governing the joint development and sharing of "defensive data" as required by the Administrator to fill a data gap. The new provisions would:

(1) Allow registrants 120 days to respond to an EPA data request, rather than the present 90 days;

(2) Require, rather than permit, registrants to enter into joint data development arrangements, unless all registrants agree otherwise;

(3) Establish a cost-sharing arrangement under which each of the joint data developers would pay an initial cost of $100,000 or divide equally 25 percent of the estimated total cost, whichever is less, and pay the balance of the costs as needed on a pro rata basis, according to individual United States market share of the pesticide in question. Each participant's share would be determined by an independent auditor, based on the most recent available sales figures;

(4) Provide for suspension of the registration of any registrant that fails to enter into a joint data development arrangement for the products for which the additional data are requested, and make such arrangement enforceable in a Federal district court action instituted by any of the participants;

(5) Expand the scope of hearings provided for registrants who appeal such suspensions to allow consideration of whether the Administrator had a valid and reasonable basis for requiring the additional data. Now such hearings are restricted to considering whether the registrant has failed to take the action required to provide the requested data and whether the suspension order provides for disposition of existing stocks consistent with the Act. Other hearing provisions would be unchanged;

(6) Provide a 15-year period of protection for defensive data, following the date the data were submitted, during which time any party could obtain the right to use defensive data by joining the joint data development group and reimbursing the previous members of the group. The new member would pay a share of the total data cost in proportion to the number of persons sharing in such cost. The payment then would be distributed among the previous group members according to the amount of their contribution;

(7) Provide for data submitted by a registrant after September 30, 1978, to replace previous data that are deemed scientifically insufficient by generally accepted standards to be treated in the same way as defensive data requested by EPA, except that other registrants would be entitled, but not required, to participate in joint data development arrangements; and

(8) Provide a transition between current procedures and the new procedures of this amendment by giving persons, who had received notices from EPA asking for additional data to support existing registrations, the right to compel joint data development with other registrants currently performing testing. This option must be exercised within 120 days after enactment of the bill.

Subsection 4(a)(3) of this Act extends the comment period from 30 to 90 days for persons wanting to comment on applications for registration. Subsection 4(a)(4) adds a requirement that the Administrator shall, when registering a pesticide, make a written determination with respect to the active and inert ingredients of a pesticide. Another change specifies that the determination shall be that the pesticide, when used in accordance with widespread and commonly recognized practices, "will not cause unreasonable adverse effects on the environment," instead of "will not generally cause . . ." as under existing law. A new subparagraph (E) is added establishing the new "will endanger" standard applicable to a pesticide's potential hazards to man. The Administrator is further directed to consider a full range of potential chronic health effects in determining whether a pesticide "will endanger" human beings.

Subsection 4(a)(b) of this Act eliminates the Administrator's existing authority to waive efficacy data requirements. A new provision is added requiring the Administrator to publish in the Federal Register a summary of the factual basis supporting registration actions. Persons adversely affected or opposed to registration actions are granted the same remedies to initiate judicial review of the action as specified in section (6) of FIFRA.

Subsection 4(a)(5) of this Act removes the Administrator's discretionary authority to deny registrations when the basic requirements of paragraph (5) are not met. The clause "the Administrator may refuse to register a pesticide" is changed to "the Administrator shall . . .".

Subsection 4(a)(6) of this Act alters when the Administrator may grant a conditional registration for a pesticide under section 3(c)(7) of FIFRA. The new provision prohibits the Administrator from granting a conditional registration for a use of a pesticide which has previously been cancelled or suspended. The same prohibition applies if a registration was voluntarily withdrawn, if the Administrator determines that the voluntary withdrawal was associated with concern over potential adverse effects of the pesticide. Another provision is added requiring the Administrator to make available to the public, subject to section 10 of FIFRA, the data submitted in support of a conditional registration, along with a list of outstanding tests to be performed on the pesticide and the timeable governing completion and submission of the tests.

Subsection 4(a)(7) of this Act strikes the so-called "Grassley-Allen" amendment pertaining to the conditions which must be met before initiating an interim administrative review (formerly known as an RPAR review, now called a Special Review). The Grassley-Allen amendment prohibits the Administrator from initiating a Special Review, unless the Administrator has "a validatd test or other significant evidence raising prudent concerns of unreasonable adverse risk to man or the environment."

Subsection 4(b) amends the provisions pertaining to classification of pesticides under section 3(d) of FIFRA. The Administrator may classify a pesticide for general use when it "will not cause unreasonable adverse effects . . ." rather than when it "will generally not cause . . .". The Administrator is further directed in all decisions pertaining to classification to consider the potential contamination of groundwater in determining whether pesticide should be classified for restricted use. The allowance in section 3(d)(1)(c)(ii) that a restricted use pesticide may be applied "under the direct supervision" of a certified applicator is eliminated.

Subsection 4(c) amends the "miscellaneous provisions in section 3(f) of FIFRA. Under current law, a pesticide registration is prima facie evidence that a pesticide is in compliance with the Act, unless a cancellation proceeding is in effect. This provision is amended to provide the registration of a pesticide constitutes such evidence only if the active ingredient has been registered after enactment of this Act or re-registered since October 21, 1972, and provided that a cancellation proceeding is not in process and that no required studies are outstanding. The Administrator is granted authority to consult any state, in addition to other federal agencies, in connection with regulatory action under FIFRA.

Subsection 4(g) extensively amends the provision of FIFRA requiring that pesticides be re-registered "in the most expeditious manner practicable.". The new provision requires the Administrator to publish in the Federal Register a list of pesticide active ingredients not re-registered since September 31, 1978, in order of their priority for re-registration. The list is to be published by 120 days after the date enactment of this Act. In establishing the order of the list, the Administrator is directed to give highest priority to pesticides used in high volumes on food or feed crops, and to pesticides shown to cause mutagenic effects in an appropriately designed study using a bacterial test system. The establishment of the list shall not be subject to judicial review.

Following the same schedule, the Administrator is required to also publish in the Federal Register a list of all data gaps by active ingredient. Within one year of publication of the list of active ingredients and data gaps, the Administrator is required to initiate steps under section 3(c)(2)(B) to fill the data gaps as expeditiously as possible.

Subsection 4(g)(4) requires the Administrator to issue a notice of intent to suspend a pesticide's registration if there are outstanding data gaps on the pesticide and the Administrator has failed to include the ingredient on the re-registration priority list. Subsection 4(g)(5) stipulates that a registrant must conduct studies to fill data gaps and report the results of the studies to the Administrator within three years after the publication of the list and data gaps under paragraph (3) above. Data gaps shall be filled according to the schedule specified in the 3(c)(2)(B) letters sent to registrants. When a short-term study is needed to establish appropriate dosage levels in a chronic feeding study, up to an additional year is provided for reporting the results of the chronic study to the Administrator. The Administrator is directed to issue a notice of intent to suspend a pesticide's registrations if the prescribed schedule for filling data gaps is not followed.

Subsection 4(e) adds a new subsection 3(h) dealing with inert ingredients. The Administrator is required to issue regulations specifying what tests shall be undertaken on inert ingredients. Information on inert ingredients may be disclosed under the provisions of section 10, provided that the Administrator may not disclose the percentage of each toxic inert ingredient unless such disclosure is necessary in the public interest.

Section 5 changes the requirements that must be met by persons seeking certification to apply restricted use pesticides. The amendment eliminates the existing clauses that prohibit a state from requiring a written examination as part of the certification process.

Section 6 of this Act restricts the Administrator from granting an experimental use permit for a use of a pesticide under section 5(a) of FIFRA if the use has previously been canceled, suspended, or voluntarily withdrawn for health or environmental reasons (unless there are no available alternatives). The discretion of the Administrator to suspend an experimental use permit if the terms of the permit are violated or inadequate to avoid unreasonable adverse effects on the environment is eliminated by changing "may revoke" to "shall revoke." In addition, the Administrator is required to revoke a permit if he finds that the permit will not yield data useful in satisfying section 3 registration requirements.

Section 7 of this Act amends the administrative review and suspension provisions contained in Section 6 of FIFRA. A new subsection (3) is added to the section 6(a) of FIFRA. This provision authorizes the Administrator to immediately issue a notice of intent to cancel a pesticide's registrations, or revoke tolerances, if it appears to the Administrator that false, misleading, or inaccurate information has been submitted in support of the registrations or tolerances. If a hearing is held pursuant to the notice, the issues for resolution shall be limited to whether false, misleading, or inaccurate information was submitted to the Administrator. The Administrator is prohibited from canceling a registration or revoking a tolerance if other valid data has been submitted to the Agency to replace the questionable data. The hearing shall be concluded within 90 days of issuance of the notice, and the Administrator's final decision is required 30 days after completion of the hearing.

Subsection 7(b) of this Act amends section 6(b) of FIFRA. The term "generally" is struck in the provision stating that the Administrator may issue a notice of intent to hold a hearing or cancel a pesticide's regulation because it appears to the Administrator that a pesticide "generally causes unreasonable adverse effects" when used in accordance with widespread and commonly recognized practices. The "will endanger" standard applicable to human health effects is added in the provision discussed previously in this paragraph, with specific mention of potential harm to children permitted to work in areas treated with pesticides. The "may issue a notice of intent . . ." is amended to read "shall issue . . .". The standing of a citizen, company, or public interest group to initiate and participate in a hearing under FIFRA section 6(a) or 6(b) is restored by adding a clause clarifying that a "person adversely affected by the notice" may include pesticide users, pesticide registrants, or a member of the public with or without an economic interest in the terms of the cancellation notice. Subsection 7(c) of this Act restricts the scope of a hearing held to consider data not available to the Administrator either when the registration of a previously cancelled use of a pesticide to cancellation hearing was terminated or when the cancellation decision was issued.

Subsection 7(d) adds a new section entitled "Effect of Cancellation, Suspension, or Withdrawal" of a pesticide registration. When a use or uses of a pesticide have been cancelled, suspended, or voluntarily withdrawn because of health or environmental concerns, such use or uses shall not be eligible for registration under sections 3, 5, or 24(c) of FIFRA, unless there are no alternatives to control new or expanding pest infestation. The Administrator must also have data demonstrating that the pesticide will effectively control the pest infestation.

Subsection 8 of this Act amends the reporting requirements applicable to pesticide applicators as specified in section 11 of FIFRA. The Administrator is authorized to issue regulations requiring commercial applicators to maintain records and file annual reports with the Agency regarding the time, place, quantities, and mixtures of pesticides applied, and any other information the Administrator determines is necessary.

Section 9 repeals the indemnification provisions of FIFRA which require the Administrator to compensate persons who suffer losses as a result of a suspension of cancellation of a pesticide (except for any current cases in which the indemnification procedures have already been initiated).

Section 10 of this Act establishes a private right to sue for damages or equitable relief, or both in the district courts of the U.S. A suit may be brought against a person, company, government agency, or the Administrator. An action may not be commenced under this section against a person or company, other than the Administrator, prior to sixty days after notice of the alleged violation has been made to the Administrator, the state, and the defendant. An action may also not proceed if the Administrator or state has commenced and is diligently prosecuting a civil or criminal action on the alleged violation. Legal provisions pertaining to the location, timing, and nature of unlawful acts subject to private suits under this section are specified. A court may award the costs of litigation to a prevailing party, other than the U.S. A governor of a state is granted authority to sue the Administrator under this section.

Section 11 of this Act amends the "Imports and Exports" section of FIFRA. The section 17(b) foreign government notification requirement is extended to include cases where a pesticide's registration has been voluntarily withdrawn.

Section 12 of this Act extensively amends the "Emergency Exemption" provision contained in section 18 of FIFRA. The Administrator is authorized to grant an exemption to a state or federal agency from the provisions of FIFRA when such an exemption is necessary to prevent or substantially mitigate an imminent and substantial danger to public health or welfare. An exemption for use of a pesticide may not be granted if there is an efficacious registered pesticide available to fill the pest control need for which the exemption is sought, or if an alternative pest control technology is available.

Subsection 12(c) of this Act limits the time period for an emergency exemption to one year, and allows for no more than two renewals. The Administrator is required to publish notice in the Federal Register within 10 days of applications for emergency exemptions, and to consider public comments received on the applications, unless the Administrator determines that it is necessary to grant an exemption within 48 hours of receipt of the application because of extraordinary emergency circumstances. The Administrator is further directed to disclose to the public all information contained in an application for an emergency exemption within 30 days of receipt of a request for such information. The Administrator is also required to publish in the Federal Register in a timely manner his decision and the reasons therefor.

Subsection 12(g) of this Act states that in no case may section 18 of FIFRA authorize an unregistered use of a pesticide without the prior approval of the Administrator. In extraordinary emergencies, the Administrator must act on an application for an emergency exemption within 48 hours of receipt.

Section 13 of this Act amends the research and monitoring provisions contained in section 20 of FIFRA. The amendment contains additional specificity regarding the content of the national monitoring plan called for in section 20(b) of FIFRA. The plan shall be proposed by rule not later than June 1, 1984, and effective not later than October 1, 1984. The Administrator is further required to assure the quality of data collected pursuant to the plan, and is authorized to make available the monitoring data to the public in a timely and useful way.

Section 14 of this act amends Subsection 21(b) of FIFRA requiring that the Administrator "shall", rather than "may, at his discretion", solicit the views of all interested parties on actions taken under this Act.

Section 15 of this Act transfers responsibility for regulating occupational exposure to pesticides to the Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

Section 16 of this Act amends Section 24(b) and (c) of FIFRA pertaining to the authority of states to regulate the sale and use of pesticides. A state is authorized to impose or continue in effect requirements for pesticide labeling or packaging in order to enforce a prohibition on the use of a federally registered pesticide or device in the state. The Administrator must be notified of such requirements, and keep a record of them available for public inspection.

Section 24(c) of FIFRA is amended to refer to "pesticides which are registered under paragraph (5) or 7(A) of section 3(c) . . .", rather than to "federally registered pesticides . . .". The effective date for a registration under section 24(c) is changed to ninety days after the date on which the administrator is notified by a state of the state's intention to issue the registration, assuming the Administrator does not disapprove the use during the ninety day period. The clause prohibiting the Administrator from disapproving a section 24(c) registration on the grounds of a lack of essentiality is eliminated. The Administrator is also authorized to deny a section 24(c) registration if the pesticide use is unnecessary to meet special local needs. The Administrators discretion to disapprove a special local need registration that is inconsistent with the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act is eliminated by changing "may immediately disapprove the registration" to "shall immediately disapprove . . .".

Subsection 16(b)(3)(D) specifies that a rebuttable presumption shall arise that a special local need for a pesticide does not exist if five or more states seek the same pesticide for the same special local need. The discretion of the Administrator to suspend the authority of a state to issue registrations under section 24(c) is eliminated when the Administrator determines a state is not capable of exercising adequate controls to assure that state registrations are granted in accordance with the provisions of FIFRA. This change is brought about by changing "may suspend the authority" to "shall suspend . . ." A new subsection is added stipulating that special local need registrations shall expire after five years, and may be reissued in accord with this subsection.

Section 17 of this Act amends the provisions pertaining to the appointment of members to the Scientific Advisory Panel. The amendment directs the Administrator to appoint the seven panel members from several different disciplines, and to stagger the three year terms so that the terms of no more than three panel members expire in any year.

Subsection 17(b) of this Act establishes a new requirement that the Administrator promulgate within one year regulations concerning the safe use of pesticides. The regulations shall require measures that protect individuals in the vicinity of pesticide applications, including steps to guard against exposure to pesticide drift from aerial applications. Posting areas where pesticides are to be applied, and other warnings are among the protective measures the Administrator should consider.

Section 18 of this Act amends the provisions delegating to states primary responsibility for carrying out programs to enforce FIFRA. States are required to administer an enforcement program "at least as stringent as sections 12 and 25" of FIFRA. This change would allow states to impose enforcement provisions and regulations more stringent than required by federal law. A new subsection (d) is added which grants states two years to adopt an enforcement program responsive to the new requirements and regulations established pursuant to the National Pesticide Hazard Prevention Act.

Section 19 of this Act adds a new section 32 to FIFRA. This section directs the Administrator to collect fees for registration actions under FIFRA. The fees shall be set at a level sufficient to make the pesticide program self-supporting.

Section 20 of this Act introduces another new section to FIFRA addressing the protections governing employees who have commenced actions, testified, or otherwise participated in an enforcement action or complaint under FIFRA. Remedies patterned after employees protection provisions in other statutes are specified, including the right to file and pursue a complaint with the Secretary of Labor.

Section 21 of this Act authorizes the Administrator "to establish and enforce standards for indoor human exposure to pesticides."

Section 22 of this Act contains several changes in the FIFRA statute's table of contents necessitated by the "Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Reform Act."

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senators PROXMIRE, HARKIN, LEAHY, and CRANSTON in introducing the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Reform Act of 1985.

There can be little doubt that the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Reform Act [FIFRA] is in dire need of revision. The Nation's pesticide registration program is simply not working. Serious loopholes in the health and safety data supporting pesticide registrations continue to permit serious abuses. And in addition, anticompetitive practices in the pesticides industry are destroying small businesses and driving up prices for farmers and consumers.

It is a scandal, Mr. President, that we know relatively little about the potential impact of pesticides upon public health. Consider, for example, the findings of the December 1982, House Agriculture Subcommittee staff report on EPA's pesticide regulatory program:

Between 79 and 84 percent of the products on the market were not adequately tested for their ability to cause cancer.

Between 90 and 93 percent of the same products were not adequately tested for their ability to cause genetic damage.

Between 60 and 70 percent were not fully tested for their ability to cause birth defects.

Between 30 and 46 percent were not fully tested for reproductive effects.

But the problems don't stop there.

In May 1931, after a 5-year joint investigation by the FDA and the Justice Department, the president and three top executives of Industrial Bio-Test Laboratories, Inc.—one of the largest, independent chemical scientific testing laboratories in the United States—were indicted for fraud. Tests conducted by IBT for pesticides, food additives, cosmetics, pharmaceuticals, and even coloring for ice cream were allegedly seriously flawed, or in some cases, faked outright.

FDA considered the IBT case to be the most massive scientific fraud ever perpetrated in the United States. As a result of this fraud, Mr. President, an estimated 15 percent of all pesticide active ingredients approved by EPA for use on the U.S. market had been for sale to consumers on the basis of faulty or fraudulent health and safety data.

EPA's solution to this falsified data crisis has been disturbingly slow. EPA claims it lacks the authority to remove these fraudulently tested products from the market and instead, has requested replacement studies. As of March 1984, however, EPA had requested new studies on only 243 of the 392 studies which needed to be redone. EPA decided, in other words, to defer replacement studies for fully 38 percent of these substances, choosing instead to address them in the future under routine review.

Obviously, Mr. President, these are very serious health and environmental concerns. They require prompt congressional action. And so do the anti-competitive practices of the pesticide industry which threaten the economic well-being of small businesses, farmers, and consumers.

Current FIFRA provisions have failed to prevent the continued control of pesticide pricing by a few multinational chemical corporations. Large chemical companies have used the proprietary and exclusive use provisions of FIFRA—intended to protect innovation while guarding against long term, monopolistic control of pricing—to thwart competition. In recent years, these same companies have also sought to utilize the emergency exemption provisions of FIFRA to secure back door registration of new products.

The end result of these practices? Less competition and higher prices.

The bill we are introducing today will go a long way in addressing the concerns I have outlined.

It will make it easier to remove pesticides from the market when faulty registration data is discovered. It will also close a number of loopholes in the act, including the emergency provisions section, which are used to circumvent its requirements. And this bill will open up the entire registration process to more public scrutiny.

This bill will also help to improve the competitive atmosphere of the pesticide industry. Not only will it prevent the back door registration of pesticides by a handful of companies, but it will enable competing firms to buy into the production of defensive data, at a cost to be determined by their market share of the specific product. This provision will assist small-scale pesticide producers who would otherwise be unable to generate the information on their own or afford the costs of developing the data.

Mr. President, the legislation we are introducing today will help protect the public health and promote competition in the pesticide industry. I urge its prompt consideration and passage.●

By Mr. KASTEN:

S. 310. A bill to direct the President to impose certain limitations on the amount of milk protein products that may be imported into the United States; to the Committee on Finance.

MILK PROTEIN FAIR TRADE ACT

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, it is time for action on casein imports. Subsidized imports of casein have displaced large quantities of domestically produced nonfat milk every year since restrictions on these imports were rejected by the Congress in the 1981 farm bill debate.

In 1983 alone, it is estimated that 159.5 million pounds of imported casein displaced about 400 million pounds of nonfat dry milk. Because the Federal Government must purchase surplus dairy products under the price support program, the taxpayers paid for this displacement, to the tune of about $350 million.

Today I am introducing legislation to correct this problem. The Milk Protein Fair Trade Act—which has also been introduced in the other body by my colleague from Wisconsin Mr. ROTH—would direct the President to impose a quota on imports of casein equal to 50 percent of the average yearly imports during the period from January 1, 1979 to December 31, 1983. The imposition of this quota would be pursuant to section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1935, which authorizes trade restrictions on imports determined to interfere with domestic price-support policies.

Mr. President, this legislation would authorize the establishment of an import licensing system for milk protein products—primarily casein. This is in recognition of the fact that not all casein imports displace domestic dairy products.

Under this licensing system, first preference would be given to those importers who demonstrate that their importation of casein is for purposes for which no substitutes are available. Second preference would be given to importers using casein for purposes for which domestic skim milk or skim milk substitutes cannot be substituted. This licensing system should adequately protect the interests of people and businesses in such fields as medicine and industry who cannot substitute dairy products for the casein they now use. In addition, the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1935 grants the President authority to review and change the quota if circumstances warrant. Finally, under this legislation the casein import quota will end on December 31, 1988.

There is no question that the cost to the taxpayers of the dairy surplus must be reduced. There is also little doubt that the unfair subsidization of imports by the nations of the European Economic Community must be discouraged. This legislation offers us the opportunity to do both these things at once. Its adoption would be a strong step toward fair trade, lower Federal spending, and fair treatment for the hard-pressed American dairy farmer.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the complete text of the Milk Protein Fair Trade Act be printed in the RECORD at this point.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Milk Protein Fair Trade Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. (a) The President shall by proclamation limit the quantity of milk protein products which may be entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption in any calendar year (or portion of a calendar year in the case of the calendar year in which such proclamation is issued) to a quantity equal to 50 per centum of the average of the quantity of milk protein products annually imported into the United States during the period beginning January 1, 1979, and ending December 31, 1983 (or, in the case of such portion of a calendar year, a proportionately lesser quantity).

(b) The proclamation issued under subsection (a) shall be considered a proclamation which is issued by the President under section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act (7 U.S.C. 624) and which meets the requirements of such section.

(c) The proclamation issued under subsection (a) shall apply during the period beginning on the day after the date of issuance of such proclamation and ending December 31, 1988.

SEC. 3. In implementing the proclamation under section 2, the Secretary of Agriculture shall establish an import licensing system for foreign milk protein products under which—

(1) first preference shall be given to those importers or users who establish that their importation or utilization of such products is for purposes for which no substitutes are available;

(2) second preference shall be given to those importers or users who establish that their importation or utilization of such products is for purposes for which domestically produced skim milk or skim milk solids cannot be substituted; and

(3) third preference shall be given to importers or users not qualifying for allocation under paragraph (1) or (2).

SEC. 4. For purposes of this Act, the term "milk protein products" includes—

(1) casein,

(2) caseinates,

(3) lactalbumin,

(4) whey protein concentrates, and

(5) mixtures containing not less than 5 per centum of any product referred to in paragraphs (1) through (4).●

S. 312. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to establish an Office of Ethnic and Minority Affairs within the Federal Communications Commission; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

OFFICE OF ETHNIC AND MINORITY BROADCASTING ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to establish an Office of Ethnic and Minority Affairs within the Federal Communications Commission. Early in 1984, I introduced identical legislation to address a serious problem in our growing communications industry.

The FCC, an independent governmental agency, has been an effective steward over the tremendous and rapid advancements in the field of communications. Corresponding with the growth of the communications industry is the growth of the FCC itself. I am concerned, however, that this agency now is becoming too big to respond to special communities and circumstances and too big to assist those such as ethnics and minorities.

Presently, there are no comprehensive services for ethnics and minorities within the FCC. The purpose of my bill is to create a specific FCC department to be a clearinghouse for complaints and suggestions regarding radio and television broadcasting which affects ethnic and racial minorities. Although it is not the intention of this legislation to mandate specific programming or to assist current or potential ethnic and minority broadcasters, this legislation would advocate educational programming and would encourage a more positive public image of ethnics and minorities.

I expect this legislation to cost very little. Even though the FCC now has no comprehensive services for ethnics and minorities, there are many departments within the FCC which have people who specifically handle ethnic and minority matters. This legislation would mostly use existing resources within the FCC to create this Office.

Since the FCC is committed to broadcast deregulation, I believe it is in the best interest of Congress, the administration, and the broadcast industry that we show ethnic and minority communities, which are often the most adversely affected by deregulation, that there is a special Federal office to assist them and to register their opinions on broadcasting every year. Thus, it is appropriate that we move to establish an office within the FCC to more effectively deal with these problems.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of my bill be printed in the RECORD in its entirety.

Thank you, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 312

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Ethnic and Minority Affairs Broadcasting Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. Section 5 of the Communications Act of 1934 is amended by inserting after subsection (d) the following new subsection:

"(e)(1) There shall be established within the Commission an office of ethnic affairs to be known as the 'Ethnic and Minority Affairs Office'. The Ethnic and Minority Affairs Office shall—

"(A) carry out an educational program that—"(i) promotes educational ethnic and minority programming;

"(ii) encourages the positive portrayal of ethnic groups in radio and television broadcast programming; and

"(iii) demonstrates the importance of such a positive portrayal on the part of the mass media;

"(B) receive complaints and grievances regarding radio and television broadcast programming which unfairly depicts ethnic groups;

"(C) collect, analyze, and prepare information from public and private agencies related to the portrayal of ethnic groups by radio and television broadcast programming, and furnish such information, upon request and without charge, to public and private agencies that serve the needs and interests of such groups;

"(D) conduct an annual conference designed to focus public attention upon the images of ethnic groups and minorities depicted by radio and television broadcasting programming and encourage the participation of such individuals and organizations, public and private, that serve the needs and interests of such ethnic groups and minorities;

"(E) prepare and transmit to the Congress an annual report which details the activities of the Ethnic and Minority Affairs Office, including a compilation of all grievances filed under subparagraph (B); and

"(F) make such information available to the Commission which may be used for reviewing applicants for licensing.

"(2) Not later than ninety days after the date of the enactment of the Ethnic and Minority Affairs Broadcasting Act of 1984, the Commission shall establish the Ethnic and Minority Affairs Office and provide appropriate staff and services for it to carry out its functions under this subsection.".●

S. 313. A bill to amend the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities Act of 1965 to provide for the Office of Poet Laureate of the United States; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

OFFICE OF POET LAUREATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I am reintroducing today a bill which would create the Office of Poet Laureate of the United States. An amendment to the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities Act of 1965, this measure is identical to one which I first introduced in the 88th Congress and, most recently, in the 98th Congress.

The proposed Poet Laureate would be appointed by the President of the United States, in consultation with the National Council on the Arts, from among poets whose work reflects the qualities and attributes associated with the historical heritage, present achievements, and future potential of the United States. The Poet Laureate would perform duties assigned by the President and continue his or her own creative endeavors.

The United States is one of only a few advanced nations which have failed to give appropriate recognition to its great poets. England, from which we inherited many of our cherished democratic ideals, officially created the position of Poet Laureate in the 17th century, but the unofficial origin of the honorary position dates back to the reign of King Henry III in the 13th century. Japan and China also have given official national recognition to their great poets since early in their history.

In our own country, poets such as Carl Sandburg, Robert Frost, Walt Whitman, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Archibald MacLeish, Robert Penn Warren, Phyllis McGinley, and James Dickey have captured the American spirit in a unique and timeless way. The establishment of an American Poet Laureate may encourage and stimulate similar contributions to our cultural heritage from others and would add a new dimension to historic and ceremonial occasions, such as the upcoming bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution. I believe that the recognition accorded to the Poet Laureate also would inspire and encourage young and relatively unknown poets, giving them a goal to which they might aspire.

Mr. President, I have always envisioned the post of Poet Laureate as a largely honorary position and my bill would leave it up to the President of the United States to set the Laureate's compensation either in the form of expenses or regular stipend. The bill would set a limit on the amount, however, and provides that the Poet Laureate's compensation shall not exceed 60 percent of the salary of a Federal district court judge.

I urge that early consideration be given to my bill and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 313

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities Act of 1965 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

POET LAUREATE OF THE UNITED STATES

"SEC. 15. (a) There is established the Office of Poet Laureate of the United States. The Poet Laureate shall perform such duties as the President shall prescribe, but the duties so prescribed shall not impair the continuation of the creative work of the individual chosen to be Poet Laureate.

"(b) The Poet Laureate of the United States shall be appointed by the President after consideration of the recommendations of the National Council on the Arts from among poets whose works reflect the qualities and attributes associated with the historical heritage, present achievements, and future potential of the United States. The Poet Laureate shall be appointed for a term of five years, and shall receive compensation at a rate set by the President, but not to exceed 60 per centum of the salary of a Federal District Court Judge."

S. 314. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to modify the substantiation requirements for 100 percent qualified business use of passenger automobiles and to provide an exemption for agricultural vehicles from the requirements of section 280F of such code (relating to limitation on certain property used for personal purposes); to the Committee on Finance.

SUBSTANTIATION REQUIRED FOR 100 PERCENT QUALIFIED BUSINESS USE OF PASSENGER AUTOMOBILES

● Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation dealing with the provisions in the 1984 tax bill which require taxapayers to keep detailed contemporaneous records of the business use of their transportation vehicles.

This legislation would remove the contemporaneous recordkeeping burden from those taxpayers who use transportation vehicles solely for business purposes. I have also cosponsored legislation that would repeal this new recordkeeping requirement. I offer this legislation as a workable alternative in the event that total repeal is not feasible.

This legislation provides, first of all, that those taxpayers who use a vehicle 100 percent of the time for business purposes would not be required to maintain "adequate contemporaneous records." Instead, the prior law would apply to require that the taxpayer maintain adequate records or have other sufficient evidence corroborating the business use of the vehicle.

In addition, the principal user and the employer would be required to sign an affidavit at the beginning of the year as to the intended use of the vehicle and at the end of the year as to the actual use. If the intended use were to change during the year, then the requirement for contemporaneous records would go into effect. For purposes of determining if a vehicle is used 100 percent of the time for business purposes, the use by the employee of the vehicle for commuting purposes, if it is for the convenience of the employer, would not be counted.

Examples of vehicle use which is for the convenience of the employer include vehicles taken home to prevent theft or vandalism; vehicles used by employees on call who go to and from job sites from their residences; and vehicles used to transport employees to job sites when required by the nature of the project.

Furthermore, in the case of all agriculture vehicles, the 1984 legislation requiring contemporaneous records would be repealed. For agriculture vehicles, the pre-1984 requirements would apply so that the taxpayer would have to maintain adequate records or have other sufficient evidence corroborating his own statement of the business use of the farm vehicle.

With these changes, the additional paperwork burden would be removed for many businesses; and it would be removed in those cases where it is particularly inappropriate to impose this kind of paperwork burden. This is a start toward making these rules more reasonable, but I will also support other proposals that address this problem. The best situation would be repeal, but short of that, we must take action to remove these excessive and unnecessary burdens from the business community.

The 1984 legislation, to the extent that it limited the amount of depreciation deductions and investment tax credits that taxpayers may claim on transportation vehicles and other business assets, had the support of Congress and was fully debated on the Senate and House floors. However, the provision for requiring adequate contemporaneous records slipped by without adequate review by Members of Congress. It was added in the conference committee and not debated on the floor. I know it slipped by me; I was unaware of it, and I think other Members were also.

The bottom line is that it is excessive. It imposes undue burdens on all taxpayers who wish to write off the value of their transportation vehicles to enable the IRS to catch those few who stretch the law. Well, that is certainly a valid purpose, and one which I support; I think we have not struck the proper balance here between enforcing our Internal Revenue laws and burdening the business community. It simply does not make sense to require every taxpayer in the country to keep a daily log of every trip made, the purpose of the trip, the mileage, and who used the vehicle. While in theory that may sound appropriate, it indicates a total ignorance of the business community and their operating procedures. We cannot expect every construction, delivery service, and maintenance business to comply with these requirements without incurring substantial costs and delays. To the extent that we impose these excessive paperwork burdens on the business community, we only breed contempt for our Internal Revenue laws and further undermine our voluntary tax compliance system.

Congress should take legislative action as quickly as possible to address this issue, hopefully by repeal; if not, then by some other approach that at least begins to remove these burdens from the business community.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. DURENBERGER:

S. 315. A bill to modify the deduction for certain tax payments to State and local governments; to the Committee on Finance.

LIMITATION OF CERTAIN TAXES AS DEDUCTIONS

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, the tax deduction used most by those who itemize their Federal income taxes is the deduction for payment of State and local taxes. Some current tax reform proposals, including the recent plan released by the Treasury Department, call for repeal of the State and local tax deduction.

Most of these proposals are aimed at "broadening the tax base"—cutting back on tax deductions and credits thereby allowing individual tax rates to fall. This is a worthy aim, and one that the American public seems to support. As a move in that direction, elimination of the State and local tax deduction seems, at first glance, a logical step.

However, it's not. Repeal of the State and local tax deduction would be a mistake. This deduction is no fat-cat loophole, it's a friend of the middle class and a protector of State and local governments and the intergovernmental fiscal system.

Though most of us aren't old enough to remember, once all taxes paid by individuals were deductible from the Federal income tax. You could even deduct your Federal income tax from your Federal income tax. It was argued that the Federal Government shouldn't be taxing income used for payments over which citizens had no discretionary school. But gradually Congress has dropped the deductibility of many State and local taxes over the years.

Shouldn't we go ahead and repeal one or more or the remaining deductions for State and local taxes—sales, income, personal property, or real estate? Isn't it worth it if overall tax rates fall? Doesn't every step to simplify Federal income taxes take the Federal Government another step out of our lives?

The answer is "No," not in light of the intergovernmental consequences of repeal. In the past, deductibility was repealed for a variety of reasons. For instance, some viewed gasoline excise taxes and motor vehicle license fees as user charges. Alcohol and cigarette excise taxes were seen as sumptuary taxes, levied to reduce consumption. In each case, Congress felt Federal deductibility was inappropriate. In many cases where deductibility was repealed, the Internal Revenue Service believed it administratively difficult to determine a taxpayer's legitimate deductions.

The remaining deductions do a lot more than help the taxpayer pay less income taxes. Through the years this deduction has helped protect the ability of our State and local governments to serve us.

First, taxpayers have their limits when it comes to paying taxes; the more the Federal Government taxes them, the less State and local governments are politically able to raise revenue from the same base. Deductibility helps preserve a little of that base for State and local governments.

There are those who argue that with deductibility, taxpayers in low-tax States subsidize a preference for government spending that high State and local taxes seem to reflect.

There are many factors, however, other than a preference for government that cause disparities in tax rates between States. Some States have a high capacity to generate revenue from natural resources, manufacturing, or financial transactions that can be used to keep rates on individual income low. Some States by any objective criteria of need must have more government spending because they are highly urbanized or carry a larger than average percentage of the Nation's poor. Some simply have more residents to tax.

For instance, Mississippi must tax its residents 2½ times more than Alaska to raise the same amount of revenue per capita. States like New York and California, with large urban areas and relatively large numbers of poor, need to finance more public services than States like Wyoming and Maine.

Deductibility doesn't wipe out these differences, but it provides a cushion for States and localities that fear losing population and business to areas with larger tax bases and lower tax rates.

For example, consider the following example of two married taxpayers itemizing deductions, each with a taxable income of $30,000 but living in two different States. Both faced marginal tax rates of 32 percent in 1982. Taxpayer A lives in a State where the combined State taxes for general sales, income, personal property, and real estate amounted to $1,000. Taxpayer B, on the other hand, lives in a higher tax State where the combined State taxes for the same items equaled $3,000. The disparity in tax liabilities between the two States equal $2,000 if none of these taxes are deductible on the taxpayer's Federal income tax.

However, if both taxpayers are permitted total deductibility of all four taxes, taxpayer A's real State tax liability drops from $1,000 to $680 while taxpayer B's real liability falls from $3,000 to $2,040. In effect, the disparity is reduced by about 32 percent.

In searching for alternatives to outright repeal, some suggest selective repeal of deductibility for certain taxes. However, this approach is just as dangerous to the intergovernmental fiscal system as outright repeal. It virtually allows the Federal Government to tell State and local officials what kind of taxes they should utilize, ignoring past political decisions at those levels about what taxes are most efficient given their particular industries and resources.

For example, selective repeal of the deductibility of sales tax payments would penalize those States that have decided to use them as a significant revenue source. There is tremendous variation nationwide as to the extent sales taxes are utilized. At least 46 States have sales taxes but in 1980, sales taxes represented about 16 percent of all deductions claimed for State and local taxes and ranged from an average of 1 percent in Oregon to 46 percent in Louisiana. In absolute dollars terms, the average size of the sales tax deduction claimed by itemizers in 1980 was $400 nationwide, ranging from $112 in Delaware to $560 in New York.

Selective repeal of deductibility of the sales tax would place States that principally rely on property or income taxes at a tremendous advantage over States which extensively utilize sales taxes. The Federal Government would be forcing State and local governments to make certain fiscal choices, even though such choices might not represent the most efficient means for raising revenue in a particular State.

Echoing this fact, the Ways and Means Committee stated in its report on the Revenue Act of 1964 that:

It was further indicated that, if property and income taxes are to be deductible for Federal income tax purposes, it also is important to allow the deduction of general sales taxes. To deny the deductibility of general sales taxes while allowing deductions for the other major revenue sources would encourage State and local governments to use these other resources in place of the sales tax * * * it is important for the Federal Government to remain neutral as to the relative use made of these three forms of State and local taxation.

The intrusion of the Federal Government into State and local fiscal choices is especially burdensome when at the same time we are trying to sort out program responsibilities and returning many of them back to State and local government. It makes little sense to tie the hands of State and local officials who must locate appropriate resources to assume those responsibilities.

As policymakers who are concerned with broadening the Federal revenue base, we are faced with a dilemma. With tax reform at the top of the national agenda, changes in the deductibility of State and local taxes is probably inevitable. Can we reconcile the genuine need to broaden the Federal tax base with the need to save the deductibility of State and local taxes?

Yes, through the compromise approach I am introducing today. This bill would allow each itemizing taxpayer to deduct those State and local tax payments which exceed 1 percent of their adjusted gross income. Everything below 1 percent AGI would be taxable. It would work similar to the existing medical deduction.

This proposal broadens the Federal tax base. If it had been included in the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act [TEFRA], the Joint Tax Committee estimates it would be raised $4.6 billion in fiscal year 1985, $4.7 billion in fiscal year 1986, $5.3 billion in fiscal year 1987, and $6.1 billion in fiscal year 1988.

It would add a little progressivity to the State and local tax deduction. A person in the 14 percent marginal tax bracket would face a tax increase of only a few dollars while a person in the 50 percent bracket would pay several hundred dollars in additional taxes. Keep in mind that only itemizers would pay any additional tax.

However, it would raise this revenue equitably. No State would gain a competitive advantage over its neighbor. For instance, expressed as a percentage of adjusted gross income, the average percentage deducted nationwide in 1980 was about 6 percent, ranging from a low of over 3 percent to a high exceeding 12 percent. Even if my proposal was in place, taxpayers in the State with the lowest overall tax burden would still be able to deduct two-thirds of his or her State taxes.

Mr. President, I don't advocate this change independent of a move to raise substantial new revenue or to significantly amend the Internal Revenue Code. However, I intend to have it ready when we discuss eliminating the State and local tax deduction in the name of balancing the budget or simplifying the code. It is imperative that in our zeal to make these changes, we not unfairly upset the intergovernmental fiscal system in the process.

S. 317. A bill entitled the "State and Local River Conservation Act of 1985"; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

STATE AND LOCAL RIVER CONSERVATION ACT

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today it is with great pleasure that my colleagues and I reintroduce the State and Local River Conservation Act.

The State and Local River Conservation Act, first introduced in the 98th Congress, is designed to stimulate conservation of rivers by State and local governments through a grants program for the purpose of establishing and administering a State river program, including the development of river management plans, land conservation strategies, regulations and demonstration projects. The act also provides protection from adverse development projects, encourages volunteer participation and clarifies existing tax laws for conservation purposes.

Traditionally, protection of natural resource areas considered of national importance has been essentially a Federal prerogative. National parks, refuges, wilderness areas, national monuments, and the National Wild and Scenic Rivers System are all controlled by the Federal Government. Bitter controversies with local citizens and landowners have marked the past decade as major units were added to these Federal systems.

Delays and deficiencies in payments for land acquisition, loss of a portion of the local tax base and the multiple use of the resource itself add to the Federal/State/local tensions. This is compounded by the perception that somehow "Washington knows best and must protect the resource from the local citizens."

Not only are Federal, State, and local relations threatened by these sorts of tensions—so too is the resource which needs protection. We need to work together to protect our outstanding natural resources, in this case, those portions of rivers identified as possessing outstanding natural values by either Federal or State Governments.

The State and Local River Conservation Act is designed to complement the National Wild and Scenic River System. Authorized in 1968, this is the Nation's chief means of protecting river segments of outstanding quality. However, after an initial flurry of activity on the part of the Federal Government, no new rivers or river segments were added to the system until the 2d session of the 98th Congress.

Legislation was passed last year to add five new rivers to the national system, bringing the total number of rivers or river segments in the system to 65, totaling about 7,200 miles.

This is just a small portion, however, of the more than 1,500 river segments, totaling 62,000 miles, the National Park Service has identified, in the Nationwide Rivers Inventory, as possessing exceptional natural values as to make them potentially eligible for inclusion in the national system. These rivers comprise about 2 percent of the 3.25 million river miles in the country.

It is clear that the national system cannot, nor is it appropriate that it should, protect all 62,000 miles of these outstanding rivers. The States and local governments must play a vital role. And they are.

In the absence of Federal action, 28 States have developed State river programs, encompassing approximately 12,000 miles of rivers. However, even among these programs, the adequacy of protection varies greatly. Because of a lack of funding, personnel, and government support, most of these programs fail to provide adequate protection and exist chiefly on paper. According to a recent assessment of State river programs prepared by the River Conservation Fund, only 11 State programs are seperately budgeted, land acquisition is not a management tool for most States and most States allocate the equivalent of one person's time to rivers.

But despite these problems, the same survey noted a number of important features that strong State river programs seem to share:

Successful State programs network well with other levels of government;

Successful programs coordinate their activities with other States and local agencies, and this task is made easier by a consistency provision in the enabling legislation;

State and local programs have the advantage over the Federal Government of being able to institute land-use controls, and the successful programs make the best of what they have; and

The best programs aggressively seek citizen participation throughout the study, designation, and management process.

The notion that States and local governments could better conserve and manage their rivers started in Minnesota with the Mississippi Headwaters Board. This board, authorized by the Minnesota Legislature, is comprised of State, county, and local officials and landowners who together manage over 400 miles of the upper Mississippi River.

This highly successful river conservation effort was developed as an alternative to proposed inclusion in the National Wild and Scenic River System. Their management plan is impressive, not only in its success, but that it is a proven, creative alternative to the Federal management of a local resource.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations, I held a hearing in Grand Rapids, MN, on the Mississippi Headwater Board's management plan. The hearing examined the elements and process by which local management of an area considered of national importance takes place, and assessed the possibilities of its application elsewhere.

We discussed, at length, alternatives for natural resource management in an effort to find new ways to achieve national policy through redesigning the respective roles of government. The State and Local River Conservation Act being introduced today rose out of the findings and recommendations made at that hearing.

The State and Local River Conservation Act strengthens State and local government's ability to protect their natural resources. Derived from successful State and local initiatives, its flexibility is needed to move the Wild and Scenic River Program forward. It is an option, with low Federal investment, to spur development of State and local river conservation efforts nationwide.

Up to $8 million a year would be available for 5 years in grants to State and local governments, or private organizations, under this bill. These grants can be used for the establishment and administration of State river programs, development of river management plans and demonstration projects, and conservation of streamside lands. These funds cannot be spent directly on land acquisition. Further, 50 percent of the funds available to a State would be passed through to local governments and private organizations. Finally, there is a 50-percent cap of Federal funds per project.

An additional $2 million would be available on a one time basis for States without river programs to conduct a statewide river assessment. Once that assessment is completed, these States would be eligible to participate in the whole program.

Third, this bill clarifies existing law concerning citizen involvement and tax incentives. There are existing authorities to promote low cost river conservation. These include laws which encourage volunteer efforts in our national parks and forests, as well as providing tax incentives for the donation of land for conservation purposes. This legislation clarifies these laws to insure that their applicability to river conservation is recognized and to encourage their use in conserving rivers.

Finally, this legislation removes roadblocks to State river conservation efforts. Presently, States can act to protect rivers, but Federal agencies can preempt those efforts and allow projects that are counter to established State policies. This bill provides a mechanism for States to concur in Federal development projects on a limited number of rivers which the State has specifically set aside for conservation practices.

Although Federal law will continue to protect many of America's rivers, the State and Local River Conservation Act will expand the options available for river conservation, often at a lower cost and with more local control. It builds on the ability of State and local interests to conserve community waters, with the Federal Government playing a supporting role in river conservation activities without becoming a dominant player.

The concepts embodied in the legislation being introduced today are in agreement with the administration's principle that river conservation and protection measures affecting State and private lands are best initiated and carried out at the State and local levels.

At hearings held last year by the Subcommittee on Public Lands and Reserved Waters, the State and Local River Conservation Act received wide national support from State and local officials, national and local environment groups and landowners associations. I believe its enactment will provide a great impetus to the many efforts already underway to conserve and widely use our Nation's precious rivers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the State and Local River Conservation Act of 1985, and bill summary, be printed in the RECORD along with my comments today.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 317

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "State and Local River Conservation Act of 1985".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) many rivers throughout the Nation possess outstanding scenic, recreational, geologic, fish and wildlife, historical, cultural, or ecological values which could be harmed or destroyed by adverse development;

(2) the Nationwide Inventory of Rivers lists many rivers possessing such values and a number of outstanding rivers have been designated for protection under the National Wild and Scenic Rivers System, but that system does not include all rivers which require protection; and

(3) Federal incentives for river conservation through a cooperative effort among Federal, State, and local governments, landowners, and private organizations, can provide a significant additional means to protect the values of many outstanding rivers which are not presently included in the Federal system.

(b) The Congress declares that it is the purpose of this Act to stimulate the conservation by State and local governments and by private nonprofit organizations of rivers which have outstanding scenic, recreational, geologic, fish and wildlife, historical, cultural, or ecological values.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this Act, the term—

(1) "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior;

APPROVAL OF STATE AND LOCAL PROGRAMS AND ASSESSMENTS

SEC. 5. (a) A State may submit a State program to the Secretary for his approval under ths section. The Secretary shall approve such program if he determines that, by State statute, constitution, or Executive Order, the program—

(1) designates rivers or river segments within, or contiguous to, such State which are recognized for their natural and environmental values;

(2) establishes clearly defined lateral and terminal boundaries for such designated segments pursuant to a process and criteria which are adopted prior to designation;

(3) contains State policies for the protection of such designated rivers or river segments from new dams, water resources projects, and other developments which would adversely affect those values;

(4) manages such designated river or river segments under special regulations designed to preserve the values for which the river or segment was designated, including regulations regarding the consistency of State and local actions (including permits and other forms of State or local approval) with the preservation of such values;

(6) includes an identification of Federal financial assistance programs and Federal development projects for which the State will review individual assistance applications or development projects for their effect on designated rivers or river segments pursuant to the procedures set forth in Executive Order 12372 as in effect on September 17, 1983, to determine whether such assistance applications or development projects would be consistent with, and further the purposes and objectives of the program prepared under this subsection.

For the purposes of paragraph (6), identification shall not be limited to the assistance programs or development projects subject to the Executive Order 12372 but may include any programs listed in the most recent Catalog of Federal Domestic Assistance which may have an effect on the purposes and objectives of the State's river protection program.

(b) A State may submit a State river assessment to the Secretary for his approval under this section. The Secretary shall approve such assessment if he determines that it includes—

(1) an identification of the natural and environmental values of rivers within, and contiguous to, the State;

GRANTS FOR STATE ASSESSMENTS

SEC. 6. (a) For the purpose of developing State river assessments, the Secretary may make grants to a State which has not carried out such an assessment (including any State which has established a river conservation program prior to carrying out such an assessment). Not more than 50 per centum of the costs of such an assessment may be funded by grants made under this section. No State shall be eligible to receive more than one grant under this section for the development of a State river assessment.

(b) There is authorized to be appropriated $2,000,000 which shall be available until expended to carry out this section.

CONVEYANCES

The conveyance of any such interest in land in accordance with this section shall be deemed to further a Federal conservation policy and yield a significant public benefit for purposes of section 6 of Public Law 96-541.

VOLUNTEER RIVERS ASSISTANCE

SEC. 8. (a)(1) The Secretary, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the head of any Federal agency administering Federal lands, are each authorized to encourage volunteers and volunteer organizations to plan, develop, maintain, and manage, where appropriate, rivers throughout the Nation.

(b) Each Secretary referred to in subsection (a) and the head of any Federal land managing agency may assist volunteers and volunteer organizations in planning, developing, maintaining, and managing rivers. Volunteer work may include—

(1) planning, developing, maintaining, or managing (A) rivers which are components of the national wild and scenic system, or (B) rivers which, if so developed and maintained, could qualify for designation as components of the national wild and scenic system; or

(2) operating programs to organize and supervise volunteer efforts with respect to the rivers referred to in paragraph (1), conducting river-related research projects, or providing education and training to volunteers on methods of river planning, construction, and maintenance.

(c) The appropriate Secretary or the head of any Federal land managing agency may utilize and make available Federal facilities, equipment, tools, and technical assistance to volunteers and volunteer organizations, subject to such limitations and restrictions as the appropriate Secretary or the head of any Federal land managing agency deems necessary or desirable.

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today I join my distinguished colleague from Minnesota, Senator DURENBERGER, as a cosponsor of the State and Local River Conservation Act.

Some 7,000 miles of river throughout the Nation are protected under the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act. As the name indicates, this act created a Federal program to preserve the wild and scenic character of our most outstanding rivers. Selective preservation of these resources is vital in view of the strong pressures toward regulation of river flows and development along river banks.

Although the Federal program targets the most precious American rivers, it cannot protect all the suitable rivers. State and local governments must take the initiative to extend protection to additional streams found to have exceptional value as free-flowing waters. About half the States currently pursue river conservation programs, with the degree of protection varying widely. In most cases, a paucity of funding rather than a lack of interest operates as the primary constraint.

Since establishing its program in 1972, my own State of New York, has designated for protection 1,248 miles of river, more than any other State. Many of the rivers flow through the vast and beautiful Adirondack Park, as well as more densely populated areas. The agency that administers the program, the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation, is reviewing 8 additional rivers and estimates that up to 70 more are potentially eligible. For each designated river, the DEC prepares in cooperation with local communities a conservation plan including land use controls, protection of wetlands, flood plains, and cultural resource and recreational use of the river. Yet the program faces a severe staffing shortage, with no personnel working full time on river conservation.

The bill would encourage such State and local efforts. The bill would authorize $8 million per year in Federal matching grants to States and communities for planning efforts and program administration. An additional $2 million could be used for statewide river assessments. The bill would strengthen conservation efforts by requiring consultation with the State on any proposed activity along a designated river requiring a Federal permit. Finally, it would provide tax incentives for the donation of lands, easements, and rights-of-way and would encourage the use of volunteers in river conservation programs. I urge my colleagues in the Senate to support the passage of this valuable legislation.●

By Mr. HEINZ (for himself, Mr. SASSER, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. D'AMATO, and Mr. MURKOWSKI):

S. 318. A bill to extend the Revenue-Sharing Program for local governments through fiscal year 1991; to the Committee on Finance.

EXTENSION OF REVENUE-SHARING PROGRAM

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce, along with my colleague, Senator SASSER, a bill to extend the General Revenue-Sharing Program. The bill proposes a 5-year reauthorization of the Revenue-Sharing Program of general purpose fiscal assistance to local governments. In keeping with the fiscal spirit of our times, the bill freezes the current funding level at $4.6 billion, a funding level which has remained constant since 1976.

The General Revenue-Sharing Program provides support for an enormous range of activities, including capital expenditures for transit, economic development, community centers, and police and fire facilities. Operating programs benefiting from Federal revenue-sharing funds include downtown revitalization projects, Meals on Wheels, Community Health Care for the Elderly and the Disabled, and fire and sanitation services.

The General Revenue-Sharing Program is important to all cities, in all regions of the country. Revenue-sharing funds represent approximately 7 percent of local revenues. If we fail to reauthorize this program, it would take an average 23-percent increase in local property taxes to replace the funds currently provided. In my State of Pennsylvania, where the economy has been so distressed, a survey of local governments found that revenue-sharing accounts for 16.7 percent of the average local budget. Replacing revenue-sharing funds with property tax revenues in Pennsylvania would require an average increase of 62 percent. For nearly 94 percent of the Pennsylvania municipalities responding to the survey, revenue sharing is the only direct source of Federal funds.

Mr. President, the General Revenue-Sharing Program is the glue that holds the fiscal fabric of many cities together. I urge this Chamber not to precipitously rip that fabric, for the damage may be impossible to repair. The long-term costs of eliminating revenue sharing would far outweigh any short-term advantages the foes of the program may foresee.

Mr. President, I urge all my colleagues to join me in sponsoring this extension of the General Revenue-Sharing Program. I introduce this bill at this time because the program is so important, and because it is crucial to keep it on the legislative agenda before us. All of us here are dedicated to fiscal restraint, but total elimination of revenue sharing, as some have urged, not only removes the program from this body's scrutiny, but denies several truths that we must not forget: that fiscal restraint and revenue sharing are not incompatible and that the Federal Government should do its best to stand by the towns and cities which dot this land, even in times of budgetary restraint. Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring this measure.●

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I am pleased to join in introducing legislation to reauthorize general revenue sharing [GRS] for another 5 years, and I urge my colleagues to join Senator HEINZ and me in this endeavor.

We are taking the step of pressing for a 5-year, rather than the conventional 3-year extension of GRS for several reasons.

First, efforts to reduce record Federal budget deficits may make the $4.6 billion in local GRS funds a prime target for elimination.

Second, a 5-year extension of general revenue sharing would serve to remove GRS as an object of partisan attack for the remainder of the Reagan administration's tenure in office. Already, the current administration is expected to recommend termination of this program.

Third, in the face of no growth and/or declining block grant funding in so many areas, GRS remains the sole, reliable source of assistance for essential programs for many local governments that have seen their other Federal aid programs sharply curtailed.

The latest available data as to how local governments use GRS funds confirm the value of the program. In fiscal year 1982, over half of the $4.6 billion in revenue sharing went to pay for police protection, fire protection, hospitals, and education; these are very essential local government functions.

And if local governments were to continue paying for such services—if only to keep these services at current levels—local property taxes would have to be raised. It is estimated that county property tax rates in Tennessee would jump by 24 cents if general revenue sharing is eliminated.

Fourth, with the middle of 1985 as the target date for a report on GRS—as required by the 1983 amendments to the program's last reauthorization—early movement toward this reauthorization would signal to all concerned that such a study will not affect the question of whether there is to be a GRS program, but only whether the GRS formula is properly structured.

Finally, if the Congress is interested in maintaining those Federal-aid programs which work efficiently, we need look no further than this program. Less than two-tenths of 1 percent of the GRS funds are used to administer the program; in fact, the number of personnel working in the Office of Revenue Sharing has declined steadily—by one-third—over the past 6 years. Such efficiency should serve as role model for other programs.

Therefore, I believe that the time to reauthorize general revenue sharing is now and that the appropriate time for which it should be extended is 5 years.

Mr. President, at this point, I ask unanimous consent that data showing just how local governments use general revenue sharing be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. DENTON (for himself, Mr. EAST, Mr. HELMS, and Mr. SYMMS):

S. 320. A bill to assure the first amendment rights by establishing a uniform Federal policy prohibiting taxpayer financing of private political advocacy; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NEUTRALITY IN FEDERAL EXPENDITURES ACT

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Neutrality in Federal Expenditures Act. The bill will assure the first amendment rights of all citizens by establishing a uniform Federal policy prohibiting taxpayer financing of private political advocacy. The bill will answer the demand by the American people for accountability in the use of taxpayer dollars.

During this century, it has been the policy of our country that there should be limitations on the political influence of Federal employees on other citizens and on the electoral process. In 1919, a provision in the Federal Criminal Code (18 U.S.C. 1913) imposed criminal penalties on Federal employees who engage in lobbying. In 1940, President Franklin Roosevelt successfully obtained congressional passage of legislation that, in addition to modifying the existing prohibitions against political activities by Federal Government employees, also extended the provisions of the Hatch Act to officers and employees of State and local agencies "whose principal employment is in connection with any activity which is financed in whole or in part by loans or grants by the United States * * *," and most recently in the issuance by the Office of Management and Budget of the final revisions to OMB Circular A-122 concerning the treatment of lobbying costs by most nonprofit organizations receiving Federal grants and contracts.

Despite the established policy that the employees and resources of the Government should not be used to promote private political viewpoints, there has been an increasing realization that the policy is, in fact, violated with alarming frequency. The principal vehicle by which Government funds find their way into the political process is via "recipient organizations," entities that receive Government moneys or in-kind contributions through contracts, cooperative agreements, grants or other means. Government funds are awarded to recipient organizations for implementation of specific programs authorized by Congress. It appears, however, that many of the recipient organizations acquire Government funds but divert a significant portion of them away from their intended purpose to political advocacy.

For example, Prof. Marshall J. Breger in his lecture entitled "Halting Taxpayer Subsidy of Partisan Advocacy," gives the following examples: Community Services Administration [CSA], grantees have prepared sample letters for constituents to oppose the administration's budget proposals, have urged readers of a grantee magazine to write their Representatives to oppose curtailment of the Food Stamp Program, and have circulated memos urging Representatives to support continuation of the Health Planning Program. Over $42,000 of family planning grant money under title X of the Public Service Act has been used to pay dues to organizations that lobby on a regular basis.

The Organization of Chinese American Women, using funds provided under the Women's Educational Equity Act, brought at least 20 chapter representatives to Washington for a national conference whose printed schedule included "how to" lectures on political action and planned visits to Capitol Hill for meetings with legislators. Los Angeles CETA workers circulated political petitions for candidates and walked precincts on behalf of President Carter, all on Government paid time.

Additional examples of Government subsidies of partisan advocacy include:

VISTA which gave $792,156 to the Youth Project, a self-described "tax-exempt foundation which supports a wide range of grassroots social change efforts." The Youth Project gave cash and technical support to the Nevada uranium project, which opposed nuclear power and the basing of the MX missile in Nevada. It gave funds to the radical American Indian Movement's Freedom for Survival Group, and to the California Indian land acquisition project, which seeks to reclaim large portions of California for Indian ownership. The latter group, using taxpayer funds, has sued to place land in San Diego and Yosemite National Park under Indian control.

In 1981, the Department of Education gave PUSH, headed by the Reverend Jesse Jackson, $656,644. President Reagan's then Assistant Education Secretary, Vincent Reed, called PUSH's accounting system unstable and "not adequate to safeguard assets." Two studies by the Department have severely criticized PUSH's handling of Federal funds. "This does not add up to a program," said one study. While receiving Federal funds, Mr. Jackson has engaged in partisan political activity. He was a major participant in the Anti-Reagan Solidarity Day and is lobbying for more food stamps, more welfare, and less defense spending.

The antidefense lobby is substantially supported by taxpayer funds. The American Friends Service Committee, which urges policies that are tantamount to unilateral American disarmament, received a total of $596,092 in Federal funding during 1980. The U.S. Student Association, which has strong Marxist overtones, received $107,630 from the Department of Education.

The Legal Services Corporation is a semiautonomous entity that dispenses hundreds of millions of tax dollars every year. Its activities have included many examples of the misuse of tax dollars. Ostensibly created to help poor people with routine legal matters, the Corporaton has allowed its attorneys to promote a variety of fashionably liberal causes, including some that are specifically proscribed by law. Abortions, forced housing, quotas, gay rights, and rent strikes are areas in which legal services lawyers have involved themselves at taxpayers, expense.

In California, they litigated to compel payment of supplemental security income benefits to alcoholics. A suit challenging high school competency testing was filed in Florida by Legal Services. Lobbying for a graduated State income tax was one of the projects undertaken by a Massachusetts Legal Services Institute. According to a spokesman for the American Farm Bureau Federation, legal services lawyers have helped to reorganize farm workers unions in California, Florida, and New Jersey.

The Governor of Pennsylvania has blamed Community Legal Services of Philadelphia for helping to cause violence at Graterford prison in October and November 1981. Thirty persons were held hostage by a three-time killer who was returned to the general prison system as a result of a 1975 Legal Services suit. Gov. Richard Thornburgh said, "Never again should Government permit 'cause' groups * * * to place the purported rights of vicious criminals above the safety of law officers." This was a typical case of Legal Services working against, not for, the public interest.

The Legal Services Corporation also gave funding to an organization called the Coalition for Sensible and Humane Solutions to conduct training programs, the purpose of which was described as educating and informing community activists about current Federal, State, and local budget-cutting activities, and sharing and developing strategies for fighting back. The Western Center for Law and Poverty used a $60,000 grant from the Federal Legal Services Corporation to hire political consultants to coordinate a campaign opposing a tax-cutting initiative in California.

There are many additional documented examples of unauthorized use of taxpayer dollars by private nonprofit groups.

I believe that the use of Government funds for political advocacy is improper for a number of reasons. First, Government subsidy of partisan advocacy raises a first amendment problem. Why should taxpayers underwrite lobbying for ideological causes or values of which they disapprove? Or as Thomas Jefferson observed, "To compel a man to furnish funds for the propagation of ideas he disbelieves and abhors is sinful and tyrannical."

Second, the use of Federal money to promote private political points of view impairs the free functioning of the electorial process. Allowing private persons to use Government money to disseminate propaganda in support of a particular cause or a particular candidate gives the appearance of an official imprimatur for particular ideological viewpoints, opening the floodgates to Government manipulation of public opinion.

Third, the practice is the spoils system carried to an extreme. That is, Government bureaucrats provide funds to their friends who manage recipient organizations in exchange for political support and with the explicit or implicit understanding that, if their roles are later reversed, the largesse will continue.

Finally, when tax-exempt organizations use Government funds for private political advocacy, they are in fact double dipping. That is, they are receiving a double-tax paid benefit that assists them in promoting their private political viewpoints.

Mr. President, the Neutrality in Federal Expenditures Act is introduced to correct the situation. The bill is not aimed at particular parties, groups, or points of view. It would apply equally to all organizations that enjoy tax-exempt status under section 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code, that is, such organizations that receive Federal funds and that voluntarily choose to engage in lobbying activities. The bill would not advance or control any political opinion or belief, nor would it interfere with any political opinion or belief, nor would it interfere with or influence the ability of any citizen to vote as he pleases. In short, it would not act to stifle or restrict political advocacy, but would prevent the appearance or fact of Government subsidization of political ideologies.

I believe the neutrality in Federal expenditures approach is the best way to eliminate taxpayer financing of private political advocacy.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill appear in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 320

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Neutrality in Federal Expenditures Act of 1985".

DECLARATION OF PURPOSE

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) Government funds are being used to finance and otherwise to subsidize private political advocacy;

(2) the expenditure of Government funds for private political advocacy exceeds the jurisdiction of the Federal Government by not providing for the general welfare of the United States;

(3) the expenditure of Government funds for private political advocacy exceeds the jurisdiction of the Federal Government by preferring those political and ideological views, and the organized expression of such views, of the recipients of Government funds over the views of others who do not receive Government funds;

(4) the expenditure of Government funds in furtherance of such private political advocacy exceeds the jurisdiction of the Federal Government by abridging the freedom of speech and freedom of the press that are exclusive rights of the people;

(5) the expenditure of Government funds for private political advocacy exceeds the jurisdiction of the Federal Government by abridging the exclusive right of the people to petition the Government for redress of grievances;

(6) the expenditure of Government funds for private political advocacy by groups having tax-exempt status is, in effect, a double public benefit for the advocacy of these groups;

(7) the expenditure of Government funds for private political advocacy is often beyond our contrary to the intent of Congress when it appropriates funds for specific programs; and

(8) the unauthorized use of Government funds for private political advocacy threatens the very fabric of the political process.

Mr. EAST. I am pleased today to join as an original cosponsor in the introduction of S. 320, the Neutrality in Federal Expenditures Act. In doing so, I commend my colleague, the distinguished Senator from Alabama, Mr. DENTON, for his diligent service as the sponsor of this vital legislation in the 98th Congress, and now in the 99th Congress as well.

In the 98th Congress Senator DENTON introduced this legislation, then known as the Federal Neutrality Act, S. 1405, on June 6, 1983. The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. On April 25 and May 23, 1984, the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers, which I Chair, held thorough hearings on the measure. And on September 12, 1984, the subcommittee approved S. 1405 after adopting an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Unfortunately, however, the Committee on the Judiciary did not act upon S. 1405 before the 98th Congress adjourned on October 12, 1984. It is my hope and expectation that S. 320, which embodies the version of the bill that was approved by the Separation of Powers Subcommittee last year, will receive timely and favorable consideration in the Judiciary Committee, and by the full Senate, during this 1st session of the 99th Congress.

I have little doubt that a quotation from Thomas Jefferson, which expresses a principle that is at the heart of the concept behind S. 320, will be heard often in the course of the Senate's consideration of this measure: "To compel a man to furnish funds for the propagation of ideas he disbelieves and abhors," declared our third President, "is sinful and tyrannical."

President Jefferson's principle animates a general national policy that employees and resources of the Federal Government must not be used to promote private political points of view. This policy is evinced in Federal law. The so-called Hatch Act strictly limits the political activities of Federal employees. And a Federal criminal statute, codified at 18 U.S.C. 1913, prohibits Federal employees from using Government funds to lobby the Congress.

The Supreme Court of the United States has recognized Jefferson's principle as well. In 1977, for instance, the Court held in Abood versus Detroit Board of Education that it is unconstitutional to require teachers to contribute dues to a labor union that uses those proceeds to promote a political cause to which the teacher is opposed. And as the Court noted several years ago in First National Bank of Boston versus Bellotti, where governmental action "suggests an attempt to give one side of a debatable public question an advantage in expressing its views to the people, the first amendment is plainly offended."

Stated simply, S. 320 would implement the principle stated so forcefully by President Jefferson by ensuring that Federal taxpayer funds are not used, either directly or indirectly, by tax-exempt organizations for the purpose of political advocacy. It would accomplish this purpose by defining political advocacy, allowing for thorough public scrutiny of the records of these organizations to ascertain their compliance with the law, and establishing stringent penalties for violations.

S. 320 is designed to protect the first amendment rights of the taxpayer. The freedom of speech that the amendment guarantees is at the core of our political freedom as a people. But the right to speak necessarily includes the right not to speak. A citizen has a right to speak, or not to speak, in support of political causes or ideas as he or she sees fit. Thus, when taxpayer dollars are used to support or subsidize political points of view with which the taxpayer does not agree, his right to free speech is violated.

The Separation of Powers Subcommittee's hearings on this legislation last year amply demonstrated that significant amounts of Federal money are being provided to nonprofit, tax-exempt organizations that then use these revenues to subsidize the advancement of their private political viewpoints. Thus, I am convinced that the passage of this legislation to protect our citizenry's first amendment rights ought to be an urgent priority of the new Congress.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor Senator DENTON's bill, The Neutrality in Federal Expenditures Act. In the last session of Congress, I testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee in support of this legislation. The bill gained much public support, and I certainly hope that the Senate will recognize the overriding public interest in this bill, and consider and pass it in this session.

The Neutrality in Federal Expenditures Act would preclude the use of Federal dollars to support partisan or political advocacy. Increasingly, Government funds have been used by organizations enjoying tax-exempt status under section 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code to engage in promoting and lobbying on political issues. Taxpayer financing of private political advocacy gives the strong impression of Government endorsement or subsidization of political ideology. I imagine the Founding Fathers would be appalled to witness the level of Federal sector financing to influence public opinion. In Thomas Jefferson's words: "To compel a man to furnish funds for the propagation of ideas he disbelieves and abhors is sinful and tyrannical." Clearly, questions must be raised about first amendment encroachment once the Federal Government abandons impartiality in its dealings with the private sector.

An associate professor of law at New York Law School, Marshall Breger, wrote an excellent publication entitled "Halting Taxpayer Subsidy of Partisan Advocacy," which is available through the Heritage Foundation. Breger notes that:

> The unstated problem with all government subsidy of partisan advocacy is its effect on the marketplace of ideas. In the classical model, ideologies of various stripes compete for public allegiance, and interest groups compete in a pluralist hurly-burly for legislative support. In both contexts, the state stays outside the battle. Only after democratic processes articulate the popular will on a particular issue should the state act to implement that decision. The reality, of course, is far more complex. Often the state independently affects political choices made by citizens . . . . The autonomy of the state as a social interest group raises serious problems for those concerned with individual liberty. The implications of government's proper role in the marketplace of ideas remains to be adequately explored.

And, I will add, as was pointed out in a publication by Hannah Arendt, "The Origins of Totalitarianism," the State's role in the control of information and in manipulating public opinion is a necessary precursor of totalitarianism.

Government financing of political activity is clearly an aberration of the historically neutral role of the Federal Government in policy creation. Congress set strict standards on Federal employees when it passed the Hatch Act, limiting Federal Government workers in the executive branch to a severely restricted role in political affairs. A provision in the Federal Criminal Code imposes criminal penalties upon Federal employees who engage in lobbying for instance. As a Senator, I am required to maintain complete separateness between my office and campaign accounts. Congressional offices must maintain meticulous records, to avoid even the hint of impropriety in use of Government as opposed to campaign funds. Yet when it comes to ensuring that grant recipients do not lobby Congress or expend their funds toward the achievement of a political objective, Congress has failed to impose the same standards that it imposes on itself and on the executive branch. The Neutrality in Federal Expenditures Act would correct this omission, by carefully defining what constitutes political advocacy, by allowing for public scrutiny of the records of these organizations to determine whether abuses are occurring, and by establishing penalties for violations of the act.

The expansion of Government subsidization of selected political beliefs is an issue that is increasingly a source of public concern. Unfortunately, the subsidy is not always readily apparent, because it is frequently disguised in the form of grant awards or contracts which are often based on legitimate public functions. However, many recipient organizations will use Federal resources in lobbying or politically related activities, knowing that tracing the funding to the illegal lobbying is virtually impossible.

What is the extent of abuse? There is no question in my mind that opportunities exist for significant and costly abuses, many of which have already been documented by the Comptroller General's Office. The Urban Institute estimates Government funding of private nonprofit organizations to be in the vicinity of $40 billion per year; another estimate from the Administrative Conference of the United States places Federal domestic grant spending at over $100 billion annually. With limited Government resources to uncover and document abuses, no public access to records—the Freedom of Information Act does not apply to Federal fund grantees—the complexity of various accounting procedures used by recipient organizations, and with the potential embarrassment to the Government in reporting abuses by organizations of Federal funds, the prospects for uncovering abuses at present is bleak. Without the passage of Senator DENTON's bill, abuses will continue, and Federal agencies will, as the GAO acknowledged in the case of an investigation of improper CETA lobbying, find it impossible to conclusively determine whether an abuse occurred, even with detailed auditing and continuous monitoring.

Also of deep concern are the relationships that tend to develop between granting entities and the grantees; the system begins to look like cronyism. Government bureaucrats are susceptible to the temptation to secure funds for their friends who manage recipient organizations in exchange for political support. I find this situation to be incompatible with the principles of democratic, representative government.

I hope my colleagues can appreciate the importance of this issue and this legislation, and of the need to ensure fairness and equity in Federal funds distribution. In this year when we are all being asked to closely examine the budget to find savings, here is an area where the savings are readily apparent, and the decisions relatively easy. The public has ample means to influence the political and electoral process through private donations, membership in lobbying and interest groups, and through political action committees. The Federal Government cannot justify its involvement in light of the many private channels available to citizens for input into the political process, nor can Federal sector involvement be justified for reasons of fairness and equity, not to mention budgetary concerns. The public demands that their tax dollars not be spent on the patronage of selected political groups—may the Congress act on that demand.

By Mr. BURDICK:

S.J. Res. 31. Joint resolution to designate the week of November 24, 1985, through November 30, 1985, as "National Family Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

● Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, today I am again introducing a joint resolution to designate National Family Week for 1985. I am extremely pleased that National Family Week has been proclaimed every year for the past 9 years as well as in 1972, and I am confident that we will honor the family in 1985 with its own special week.

In the past, National Family Week has been celebrated during the week in November which includes Thanksgiving because of the customary and appropriate family reunions that take place for this special holiday. Therefore, in keeping with this tradition, I am asking the President to designate November 24 through 30, 1985, as "National Family Week."

The family is well established as the basic unit of American society. The purpose of National Family Week is equally basic. It establishes specific time to recognize the importance of the family in American life and the fundamental role it has played in forming the values upon which our Nation is based. National Family Week is simply a way to encourage people to pause for a moment and reflect on the way families have affected their lives and the course of this Nation.

It is unfortunate, but true, that one takes many important aspects of his or her life for granted. I am afraid that having a family is one of these aspects. To celebrate the family is not just to honor one's parents or grandparents. Nor is it just to be thankful for brothers and sisters. And it is not simply to remind us of our cherished children and grandchildren. Rather, it is a celebration of the unique relationship between all these family members. The special bond that unites the family, and from which the benefits of family flow, is truly distinctive. The family deserves high respect and recognition in our society.

Therefore, I ask my fellow Senators and the Members of the House of Representatives to again recognize the value of National Family Week and approve the resolution I am introducing.

I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 31

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the week of November 24, 1985, through November 30, 1985, as "National Family Week," and inviting the Governors of the several States, the chief officials of local governments, and the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.●

By Mr. PRESSLER:

S.J. Res. 32. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate September 15, 1985, as "Ethnic American Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ETHNIC AMERICAN DAY

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, today I am introducing a resolution to designate September 15, 1985, as Ethnic American Day. I introduced an identical resolution last year. Thirty-three of my distinguished colleagues joined me as cosponsors and the Senate passed this resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 253, unanimously. Though a similar resolution was introduced in the House of Representatives, the requisite number of cosponsors was not gained for discharge of Ethnic American Day from the Committee on the Post Office and Civil Service.

Ethnic American Day is intended to recognize the valuable contributions that ethnic Americans have made to our way of life. Their distinct heritages and cultures have all been important in the development of American society.

Our ethnic Americans have contributed valuable ideas, patriotic devotion, and diligent effort to the development of their country. Their accomplishments are readily apparent in the arts, sciences, medicine, agriculture, business, labor, and government. Without them, America as we know it could not exist.

Throughout the long and distinguished history of our country, we have been shaped by the millions of immigrants who have reached our shores. They chose the United States of America. They chose to live in this land of freedom and opportunity. The United States today has a population with more than 100 ancestry groups.

The 1980 census identifies the foreign ancestry of more than 188 million Americans. This is approximately 83 percent of our population. These statistics verify that our Nation is, indeed, a melting pot of people from all parts of the world.

Aside from our foreign-born ethnics, I would also like to mention our native American population. In my home State of South Dakota, Indians have always been an important part of our society. Their rich culture and heritage are a source of pride to me and, indeed, to all South Dakotans.

A day in tribute to our ethnic Americans, focusing on their rich ethnic heritage and love of America, can accomplish numerous goals. It would:

First, promote understanding between people of diverse ethnic backgrounds;

Second, foster an awareness and appreciation of the historical background of ethnic Americans;

Third, make Americans more aware of the significant contributions made to their country by the multitude of ethnic groups;

Fourth, promote a sense of pride among ethnic and natural-born Americans; and Fifth, emphasize the uniqueness of America and her people—a land which people from all parts of the world love and call their home.

We have before us the opportunity to simultaneously honor ethnic Americans and the country they have helped build. The immense contributions of these brave people stand as proof of the wisdom of our democratic system—a system that strives for equality, fraternity, human dignity, freedom, and the pursuit of happiness for all. Let us join together to establish, recognize, and celebrate an Ethnic American Day on the third Sunday this September.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 32

Whereas, the United States of America is a haven for victims of religious and political persecution and for those who seek freedom and opportunity;

Whereas, the United States of America has welcomed oppressed and deprived persons and granted them refuge and citizenship;

Whereas, ethnic Americans love the United States of America and have shed their blood in defense of America and its freedoms;

Whereas, ethnic Americans have made outstanding contributions in the fields of agriculture, labor, arts, science, medicine, business, and government, and to the quality of life in these United States; and

Whereas, designation of an "Ethnic American Day" would contribute to a greater appreciation of the rich ethnic heritage of this Nation and to the unity of all its people: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to designate September 15, 1985, as "Ethnic American Day" and to call upon the people of the United States to acknowledge and advance mutual understanding and friendship among all Americans regardless of their ethnicity.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 53—CONCERNING THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE

Mr. DODD submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

S. RES. 53

Whereas, the Department of the Treasury and members of Congress have proposed comprehensive and far-reaching reform of the Internal Revenue Code;

Whereas, such reforms merit careful consideration and legislative deliberation;

Whereas, individual taxpayers, businesses and investors need certainty in planning their financial affairs;

Whereas, Federal income tax consequences are essential elements to be considered in structuring many business and investment decisions; and

Whereas, it is important to encourage the orderly and productive use and investment of capital resources; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate, that it is the sense of the Senate that:

1. Changes in the Internal Revenue Code shall have a general effective date no earlier than their date of enactment;

2. Transactions and investments undertaken prior to the enactment of comprehensive tax reform by the Congress of the United States shall continue to be treated under the existing Federal income tax law; and

3. Appropriate "transition" rules shall be incorporated in all tax legislation to assure that transactions planned and entered into in reliance upon existing law shall not be subjected to new and adverse provisions.

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, it is evident that tax reform is at or near the top of every Member's domestic priority list for the first session of this Congress. Recently, Treasury Secretary-designate James A. Baker III stated at his confirmation hearing that the President considers tax reform equally as important as deficit reduction.

The resolution I am introducing today is intended to respond to problems that have surfaced in light of the current discussion about a variety of serious tax reform initiatives, many of which we will be debating in this Chamber in the near future. In addition, my proposal seeks to ensure that change in this area is approached deliberately, in a rational manner, and without adverse consequences for individuals, businesses or our overall economy.

My resolution would commit us to a principle so simple I can state it in 15 words: Tax changes would take effect only upon enactment, with appropriate recognition of potential transition hardships. Existing law would apply to activities undertaken prior to a change in the code.

I imagine to many of my colleagues this resolution appears to state the obvious and is unnecessary. On the contrary, the recent approach taken by many to tax reform legislation makes this resolution essential as we embark on the most comprehensive review of the Tax Code since ratification of the 16th amendment to the Constitution in 1913.

Recent experience contains far too many examples of revenue legislation being introduced with effective dates prior to enactment into law. The result has been an immediate chilling effect on the activities that are the subject of the legislation, even before Members of this body have had the opportunity to debate its merits and consequences. Passage of the legislation itself becomes almost immaterial. Not only do we lose important economic activity in this situation, Mr. President, the public's faith in the integrity of the legislative process is further eroded.

While we cannot and should not attempt to stop the alteration of investment decisions based on the potential for change, at the same time we are obligated to assure everyone involved that change will be implemented consistently and fairly. This resolution seeks to state the rules of the game before we get much further along with the playing of it. To do otherwise, I fear, could result in a slackening of economic activity.

To demonstrate that point, I want to bring to my colleagues' attention an article from the January 2, 1985, New York Times entitled "Tax Plan Is Already Altering Some Markets in Real Estate." The article documents the curtailment in investment in certain forms of real estate in response to certain elements of the Treasury Department's draft tax reform plan.

Let me emphasize to my colleagues that investment has been curtailed in advance of the President's endorsement or any step in the legislative process. From investors with whom I have spoken, I am convinced that this changed behavior is occurring, to some degree, as a reaction to the tendency of late to implement legislation retroactively or without adequate transition rules.

Mr. President, I am confident that every Member of this body supports the notion of tax reform and simplification. I am equally convinced that there are many differing points of view as to how to proceed with consideration of the many tax reform proposals. For my part, I would like to see the tax reform debate commence immediately, yet on a separate track insulated from the current pressures and temptations of deficit reduction discussions. To accomplish this objective, I believe we should be ready to consider the establishment of a bipartisan National Commission on Tax Reform with heavy congressional representation.

Regardless of how we get there or what proposals we ultimately adopt, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this proposal as an absolutely essential first step given the pending tax reform debate. I ask unanimous consent that the newspaper article to which I referred be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAX PLAN IS ALREADY ALTERING SOME MARKETS IN REAL ESTATE

(By Gary Klott)

Despite its uncertain fate, the Treasury's tax simplification plan is having a chilling effect on some real estate investments as economists predict that the plan, if enacted, would depress home values and make many types of new construction unprofitable.

Even though it remains unclear whether President Reagan and Congress will endorse the plan, some investors, developers and would-be buyers of vacation homes have become reluctant to enter into deals, given the far-reaching effect the plan would have in real estate.

Economists say the plan's sharp curtailment of most real estate tax benefits would dramatically alter the economics of real estate for homebuyers, developers, investors, tenants and landlords.

"Houses built on tax deals are going to get hurt, and investments based on tax benefits are going to get hurt," said George Sternlieb, director of the Center for Urban Policy Research at Rutgers University.

According to analyses of the Treasury plan by private economists, the elimination or reduction in value of homeowner tax benefits would lower the value of existing homes by about 10 percent over all.

Owners of moderate-priced homes would likely see much less of a drop. But economists foresee higher-priced residences and vacation homes—where tax benefits are more important—losing 20 percent or more in value.

"There will be a significant decline at the top end of the market," said Jesse M. Abraham, an economist at Data Resources Inc., an economic consulting and forecasting firm.

The economists' forecasts also show the plan depressing construction activity, particularly of multifamily rental units, which could put sharp upward pressure on rents.

So far, there are no signs that residential home sales or prices have been appreciably affected. But other segments of the real estate market have been affected.

Reports have circulated in the industry that some development projects have been postponed or canceled, financing deals have gone begging for investors and prospective buyers of vacation homes have backed out of deals.

Lester Day, president of American Diversified, a Costa Mesa, Calif.-based real estate investment and development company, said since the Treasury proposal was announced in late November his company has canceled more than $50 million in residential apartment and commercial building projects, plus three rehabilitation projects ranging from $5 million to $20 million each.

Stan Ross, co-managing partner of Kenneth Leventhal & Company, an accounting firm specializing in real estate, said his clients have dropped between $50 million and $100 million in projects, and cancellations among buyers of vacation homes have gone up 15 percent.

"The uncertainty is paralyzing some people," said Anthony T. Niosi, a vice president of Merrill Lynch, Hubbard Inc., an arm of the giant brokerage concern and a leading underwriter and sponsor of real estate limited partnerships. Mr. Niosi said sales of tax-oriented partnerships has slowed sharply, but sales of other types of real estate ventures where tax benefits are not significant have hardly been affected.

A LOWERING OF TAX RATES

Under the Treasury plan, most deductions, credits and exemptions would be eliminated or scaled back in order to lower individual tax rates to three brackets of 15, 25 and 35 percent. The maximum individual tax rate is now 50 percent. Similarly, the top corporate rate would be cut to 33 percent, from 46 percent, and corporations would lose many of their tax breaks.

In so doing, the plan would curtail many of the tax benefits that have helped subsidize the cost of homeownership and rental housing and helped increase the attractiveness of real estate for investors.

For homeowners, the Treasury tax plan retains the deduction for mortgage interest but its value is reduced because of the lower tax rates. The deduction is now worth as much as 50 cents on the dollar for a taxpayer in the top bracket. But with the top rate reduced to 35 percent under the Treasury plan, a $1 deduction would be worth no more than 35 cents. In addition, real estate taxes could no longer be claimed as an itemized deduction. Furthermore, the plan places a cap on the amount of mortgage interest that can be deducted on vacation homes.

PRESSURE ON PRICES

These cutbacks would make the after-tax cost of carrying a house more expensive. As a result, home prices would have to fall in order to keep the costs in line with what prospective homebuyers are willing—or able—to pay.

It is similar to the effect high mortgage rates have on home prices. When mortgage rates are high, the monthly carrying costs put homeownership out of the reach of most Americans. As a result, owners looking to sell their homes would have to sharply reduce the purchase price in order to keep the costs in line with what prospective buyers could afford.

The cutback in deductions does not mean that an individual's overall tax bill will necessarily go up. In fact, the Treasury estimates that nearly 80 percent of taxpayers will find their tax bills the same or lower under the tax plan. Furthermore, it is not clear which, if any, of the Treasury tax proposals will become law.

But Kenneth T. Rosen, director of the Center for Real Estate and Urban Economics at the University of California at Berkeley, said the tax changes could significantly influence purchase decisions because the smaller tax deductions would have the effect of increasing the relative cost of housing compared to other goods. He said his research has shown that tax deductions are an important factor in housing cost decisions.

Mr. Rosen suggests that the Treasury plan would lead many buyers to opt for a smaller house.

Consider, for example, the carrying costs of a $100,000 home, financed with an $80,000 mortgage at 13 percent interest, with property taxes assessed at $1,500 a year.

According to Mr. Rosen's calculations, the after-tax carrying cost of the house for a family now in the 35 percent tax bracket would increase 20 percent under the Treasury plan, to $775 a month, from $645. The reason is that the family would move down into the 25 percent tax bracket under the Treasury plan, thereby making the mortgage interest deduction worth only 25 cents on the dollar instead of 35 cents. At the same time, property taxes could not be deducted.

As a result of the higher carrying costs, Mr. Rosen estimates that a $200,000 home would drop about 18 to 20 percent in value; a $100,000 home would drop about 10 to 12 percent, and a $50,000 home would fall about 2 to 3 percent.

DECLINE IN MORTGAGE RATES

Mr. Abraham of Data Resources said his company's computer analysis of the Treasury proposal's impact on the general economy and the real estate sector shows mortgage rates could be expected to fall by nearly one-half of 1 percentage point—partly because residential construction is forecast to drop by about 8 percent. The drop in rates, he said, could partly offset the effect of the loss of tax benefits on home prices.

According to the analysis, he estimates a $384,000 home would lose 20 to 25 percent in value; a $205,000 home would drop 15 to 20 percent; a $128,000 home about 13 percent; an $84,000 home about 8 percent, and a $45,000 home about 4 percent. A $25,000 home would gain slightly in value, the analysis found.

But Mr. Sternlieb of Rutgers believes the average homeowner would be better off under the Treasury plan, given that the majority of homeowners do not itemize deductions and also because he believes mortgage rates would decline even further than Data Resources forecasts.

EFFECT ON VACATION HOMES

Vacation homes would likely be hit harder than residential homes because of the cap that would be placed on mortgage interest deductions for second homes. While the plan would continue to permit unlimited mortgage deductions on principal residences, it limits the deduction for all other interest expenses—including those on vacation homes, cars and credit cards. Under the formula, the deduction would be limited to $5,000 plus the amount of any investment income the taxpayer receives, such as interest from bank savings accounts.

For someone with no investment income and no other interest expenses, the new rules would provide a full deduction only for vacation home mortgages of less than $40,000 at prevailing rates, or about $417 a month. Any interest above that amount could not be deducted.

Kurt Karl, an economist at Wharton Econometrics, estimates that only about 3 percent of taxpayers would be affected by the interest cap on vacation homes. But prices in resort areas could take a beating because vacation homes are not considered necessities and are thus more vulnerable to price pressures, said Lewis Goodkin, a Fort Lauderdale, Fla., real estate consultant.

Mr. Rosen estimates that vacation homes running about $125,000 could drop 25 percent in value under the Treasury plan.

Economist, such as Lawrence Chimerine of Chase Econometrics, believe the hardest-hit real estate sector would be multifamily rentals. Builders and developers contend the income flow from rents at current levels is insufficient to make new projects profitable in the absence of tax benefits.

But part of the rationale behind the Treasury proposal is that too much money may have flowed into real estate because of tax benefits, as attested by the current glut of office space in many cities, thereby depriving other segments of the economy of investment money. The Treasury contends free-market forces should direct investment to its most productive uses rather than having tax benefits distort investment decisions.

A host of real estate investment tax benefits would be cut back under the Treasury plan. Accelerated depreciation, which has allowed buildings to be written off in 18 years, would be replaced by a system that stretches out the write-offs over a much longer period of time, thereby providing the owner with smaller deductions each year.

In addition, the tax plan would reduce the value of interest deductions on investment properties by discounting the payments for inflation. At the same time, anybody who receives interest would get to reduce the interest income by an amount set by the Treasury so that the recipient is no longer taxed on income due solely to inflation.

Furthermore, the tax rules would eliminate a prime attraction for individual investors in real estate tax shelters. The rules would prevent big real estate syndicates—those with more than 35 investors—from passing tax losses on to participants who use these losses to reduce their personal income tax bills.

"If they take away the tax incentives, nobody is going to be building an apartment building until rents go up significantly," said Neil Bluhm, president of JMB Realty Corporation, a leading real estate syndicator.

Mr. Sternlieb of Rutgers University said that the kind of rent increases that would be necessary to offset the loss of the tax benefits would be difficult to attain given that rents have already been pushed about as far as personal income levels will support.●

THE STOCKHOLM CONFERENCE: A REPORT ON ITS FIRST YEAR

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, last November, I visited the Stockholm Conference on confidence-building measures in Europe. There I held detailed consultations with the U.S. delegation and had a thorough exchange of opinions with the chief of the Soviet delegation, Ambassador Oleg Grinevsky. Although there are many differences between our country and the Soviets, I came away from my discussions in Stockholm convinced that there are real possibilities there for taking practical steps to reduce the risk of war in Europe.

It is my profound belief that we have neglected for too long the vital task of putting into place in Europe arrangements which will help prevent miscalculations and crises and by these means reducing the risks of war in Europe to the vanishing point. Such measures cannot be a substitute for substantial reductions in both conventional and nuclear forces. They can, however, complement other arms control measures in a way which would make the world truly safer for all of us.

Recently, the Stockholm Conference agreed unanimously to proceed to the next phase of the negotiations by establishing working groups to begin the process of detailed analysis and criticism which is the necessary precondition to the drafting of agreements. In my meeting with the Soviet ambassador to the Stockholm Conference, I emphasized that the U.S. Senate solidly supports President Reagan's efforts to bring about meaningful and equitable agreements to reduce the risks of war. Let us hope that Soviet agreement to enter this new phase of the negotiations in Stockholm means that the Soviets are now also prepared for such agreements.

Recently, Ambassador Goodby, the head of our delegation in Stockholm gave a year-end report on the Conference to the French Institute of International Relations. I find this report to be a good, succinct summary of the issues before the conference, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

THE STOCKHOLM CONFERENCE: A REPORT ON ITS FIRST YEAR

I. THE STAKES

Last July, your distinguished and talented Associate Director, Pierre Lellouche, wrote in Newsweek magazine that "The Soviets are quietly turning the Stockholm forum into a deadly machinery to alter to its advantage the postwar political and strategic order in Europe." Their method, he wrote, was to influence Western public opinion through "empty but nice sounding declarations"; their objective was to establish a "Pan-European security order from which the United States would ultimately be expelled." And he argued that "Western weakness . . . makes for the steady success of Moscow's strategy."

It is too seldom noticed that the Stockholm Conference, in fact, is addressing matters which could lead to profound changes in the present system of European security. Because the Conference is dealing with some of the most fundamental issues of Western security, it is no exaggeration to say that the essential agenda of Stockholm is the future political and strategic order in Europe. Stockholm is a part of the struggle between contending visions of the future. Ideas which are being discussed there must necessarily be seen as potentially contributing to the success of one or the other of these visions.

The Soviet vision we know well. As practiced in the past it has required limitations on the sovereignity of neighboring states; it is based on the expectation of endless confrontation and an impulse towards hegemony, as the ultimate requirement of security. The Western vision hopes that despite deep and persisting ideological differences, the walls which now devide the community of European nations can give way to a system more tolerant of diversity; that security can be found in balance and restraint. Of course, we are speaking of long historical processes, and, of course, the Stockholm Conference is only one of the arenas in which this "long twilight struggle" is being conducted. But when one hears of the seemingly trivial debate in Stockholm over obscure or arcane points, it is well to recall, as Mr. Lellouche has done, that the ultimate stakes are very high indeed.

II. THE BALANCE SHEET

If the stakes in this "Great Game" are so fateful, we must weigh what the Soviets have done to create a new strategic order in Europe and what degree of success they have achieved. As Pierre Lellouche suggests, some Soviet proposals at Stockholm are "empty but nice-sounding declarations." Others have more content, but it is of a nature designed to disadvantage the West. Some proposals, such as those relating to chemical weapons and military budgets, would cut across useful and promising work being done elsewhere. In these categories fall the following Soviet proposals: a pledge not to be the first to use nuclear weapons; nuclear-free zones; a freeze and reduction of military budgets; and a ban on chemical weapons in Europe. And, indeed, as Mr. Lellouche suggests, these proposals have the potential of altering the global balance of power.

But the fact is there there is no ground swell of support at Stockholm for this Soviet program nor for any individual proposal in it. The neutral and non-aligned countries have introduced a series of proposals, the thrust of which is quite different from the direction taken by Moscow. The countries of the Atlantic Alliance have patiently exposed the shortcomings in each of these Soviet proposals. No one can credibly contend that the Soviets have succeeded in turning Stockholm into a propaganda platform which has deceived public opinion. The press, when it covers Stockholm, quite sensibly has found the stock items of the Soviet program to be not very interesting. Moscow has tried hard to steer Stockholm toward a polemical debate about nuclear weapons. As the party which last year chose to turn its back on nuclear negotiations, however, the Soviet case has not seemed very plausible.

Now we should ask how Western ideas are faring at Stockholm. Norway's Johan Holst wrote recently that "Confidence-building measures should be viewed as elements in a process for peaceful change of the post-war political order in Europe toward a more open, equitable, and cooperative order." These words elegantly sum up the larger aims of the proposals which the Atlantic Alliance has introduced in Stockholm. The West has held that Stockholm can be a place for serious arms control business and that this should be based on the principle of cooperation among all participants on an equal footing. An approach based on mutual, rather than unilateral, advantage in the building of confidence and the enhancement of stability implies a relationship among all the nations of Europe which is antithetical to the instinct for hegemony. Among other things, the proposals of the Atlantic Alliance emphasize the need for accurate perceptions of the intent of military operations, as a remedy for miscalculation and a deterrent against surprise attack. This objective requires positive cooperation, since it concerns the act of reassurance. And that means greater openness, or as the Belgian Ambassador at Stockholm nicely put it, the "de-mystification" of military activities on the continent of Europe.

In contrast to the polite but rather indifferent reaction to the supposedly eye-catching wares of the Soviet Union, the down-to-earth ideas which have been advanced by the countries of the Atlantic Alliance are in the mainstream of the Conference. The neutral and non-aligned group has presented very similar proposals. The debate in the Conference has been focused primarily on the theme of how to strengthen the practical confidence-building measures first developed in the Helsinki Final Act of 1975. The press in Western Europe almost unanimously has seen the purpose of the Stockholm Conference as that of reducing the risk of war through implementing practical measures designed to prevent crises and foster practical forms of cooperation. In short, Western ideas and the specific methods of implementing those ideas seem to be accepted as the real business of Stockholm.

I turn now to a description of some of the specific Western proposals and objectives in Stockholm and to a few of the key developments of the year just passing.

III. A NEW APPROACH TO ARMS CONTROL

Stockholm is not only about political visions; it is also and most immediately about a new approach to arms control. In the last quarter of a century very few arms control efforts have been aimed at eliminating the proximate causes of war, such as crises arising from misperceptions. Arms control negotiations typically have dealt with reducing the perceived threat, whether that be the threat perceived from arsenals of nuclear warheads or from the levels of conventional forces in Central Europe. The few arms control attempts to deal directly with the "proximate" causes of war have been important but limited in scope and objectives, the Moscow-Washington "hot line" and the United States "incidents at sea" agreement being two examples. No comprehensive negotiation has yet succeeded in putting into place arrangements designed to prevent crises or to contain or resolve them should they occur. This is, however, the aim of the Western nations represented at Stockholm. Success in achieving this goal would encourage natural and normal relations among the countries comprising the whole of Europe.

Another way of considering the difference between "classical" arms control and the new ideas being discussed in Stockholm is that the former has dealt with the levels of forces whereas the latter deals with the operations of military forces. "Classical" arms control negotiations typically try to establish long-term stability, for example, by providing greater predictability about the types and levels of strategic forces that will be maintained over a future span of time. But in Stockholm, the Allies are urging agreements which will promote short-term stability, that is, during periods of intense and possibly turbulent international political developments which might require urgent attention. The aim would be to have procedures in place which would prevent misunderstandings possibly leading to dangerous escalation and which would assist nations in keeping potentially dangerous situations under control. How well the West has done in rallying support for this point of view may be seen in the following review of other proposals introduced in Stockholm.

During 1984, five sets of proposals were submitted to the Stockholm Conference. In addition to those of the Atlantic Alliance, proposals were advanced by Romania, by the neutral and nonaligned countries, by the Soviet Union, and by Malta.

Romania's proposals were important for several reasons. Its ideas included elements based on the Warsaw Pact's political proposals, but also included were interesting approaches to confidence-building designed to strengthen the measures agreed to in the Helsinki Final Act. One of the Soviet Union's proposals also provided for improvements in "Helsinki-style" confidence-building measures. The proposals submitted by the neutral and nonaligned countries deserve special attention because they have helped to define the "center of gravity" of the Stockholm Conference. Nine of the twelve proposals included in their approach were similar to those introduced by the Allies. Three of them went beyond the Alliance's approach, in that they called for specific limitations, or constraints, on the way military forces could be deployed. In so doing, the neutral countries identified a "gray zone" that lies between the stabilizing intent of the Alliance's proposals and the arms reduction aims of "classical" arms control. Their approach deserves—and is receiving—serious study.

The point which emerges from this is clear: there is a significant degree of convergence between all of these proposals and those made by the Allies.

IV. THE MECHANICS OF UNDERWRITING STABILITY

The nations of the Atlantic Alliance have used as their common point of departure the confidence-building measures of the 1975 Final Act of Helsinki. Those measures were modest experiments; they needed to be improved substantially. In their proposals, the Western countries are seeking to negotiate agreements that will, among other things, build on the rudimentary notification and observation procedures in the Helsinki Final Act. By mandate, the Stockholm Conference is already advancing significantly from the Final Act: by mutual agreement of all the countries, Stockholm is dealing with the whole of Europe, from the Atlantic to the Urals, whereas the Final Act exempted most of the European part of the Soviet Union.

The countries of the Atlantic Alliance are seeking to extend notification of maneuvers to include alerts, amphibious operations, and mobilization. They are urging that military units, specifically the division rather than levels of manpower, should be the basis for notifications. They are proposing an exchange of information as a standard against which to judge the significance of out-of-garrison military activities. On-site inspection to clear up questions arising from implementation of this agreement and to defuse potential crises should be a part of a strengthened regime for enhancing stability. Means for urgent communications among the participants in this system could also serve to deter or resolve crises. The Allies are seeking longer advance notice of military activities and a lower threshold for notification than was provided in the Helsinki Final Act. In addition, the Western countries are proposing to exchange annual forecasts of military operations within the zone. This annual forecast will have a constraining effect, in that it will be more difficult for a military exercise suddenly to be mounted for the purpose of political intimidation. Together with mandatory observation of all notified military activities, these measures would exert pressure for stability in Europe. By establishing normal patterns of military activities for military operations in Europe and arrangements for reacting jointly to situations outside these "norms", we would create conditions which could facilitate the resolution of potential crises.

Johan Holst has suggested that "We should look at confidence-building measures as management instruments designed to reduce the pressure from arms on the process of politics during peacetime and on decision-making in crisis and war." The Alliance's proposals are designed to do exactly that. If a system can be established which promotes stability, which damps down potential crises, which discourages the use of military force for political intimidation, and in which crises can be contained and quickly resolved, we will indeed have "reduced the pressures from arms on the process of politics".

V. SOME PERSPECTIVES ON 1984

The Foreign Ministers of the thirty-five participants opened the Conference in January 1984, a period that marked, in retrospect, the beginning of a transition in Soviet-American relations. President Reagan's major policy statement on Soviet-American relations was delivered on January 16; it was followed immediately by talks between Secretary Shultz and Foreign Minister Gromyko. Although icy winds from the East were lowering temperatures everywhere, the seeds of future negotiations were even then being planted.

Perhaps the most important political impetus which the Stockholm Conference received during the year was President Reagan's speech of June 4 in Dublin. In that speech the President, in effect, outlined the shape of an ultimate agreement when he mentioned the possibility of discussing a Soviet-sponsored proposal regarding nonuse of force if the Soviets would negtotiate concrete confidence-building measures such as those which the Alliance and the neutral countries had been advocating.

In the four sessions which were held during 1984, however, the Soviets showed little inclination to accept the Alliance's invitation to a negotiation. But just today, December 3, all participants, including the Soviet Union, have agreed on a working structure which should encourage serious and detailed negotiations. This could be a turning point. The opportunity now exists, more than ever before, for the "flexible give-and-take negotiating process" President Reagan called for in September. The portents are increasingly favorable, and we hope that the Soviets will use this new opportunity to work out agreements within the range of proposals which are truly negotiable at Stockholm. There has existed for some time a substantive "point of departure" for negotiations which many delegations have already discerned; now there is available to the negotiators a structure to facilitate detailed comparison of proposals and to begin the process of bridging the gaps.

It should be noted that many delegations in Stockholm have remarked that all the problems to which individual nations attach high priority cannot possibly be dealt with in Stockholm. But these matters need not go unattended, quite the contrary. For example, President Reagan in speaking before the United Nations on September 24 offered some ideas which would help to build confidence bilaterally between the United States and the Soviet Union. It is obvious that the Stockholm Conference is not the universe.

Many things can be done bilaterally or in other forums to improve confidence between states; these could reinforce measures agreed in Stockholm.

VI. SUMMING UP

Today, as we near the end of the Conference's first year, it seems that the West is not doing too badly, as measured against the basic thesis of Pierre Lellouche. The weakness to which he referred has not been in evidence. Perhaps we may even be permitted to say that the restoration of America's sense of strength, purpose, and confidence had something to do with this.

The Conference appears to have accepted a Western concept of security. Plenty of declarations have been heard from the East, but the majority of the Conference participants appear firmly committed to serious negotiations on practical measures designed to enhance stability in Europe. A consensus-building process has been at work which points to an outcome based on combining a reaffirmation of the renunciation of force with practical confidence-building measures intended to give real expression to that principle. And the idea of a more open continent is even more firmly entrenched than ever.

The Soviets, even if they use the new working structure to begin to hammer out a consensus, certainly will continue to offer the West self-serving panaceas for Europe's security problems. The temptation to seize easy results at the expense of meaningful results will always be there and it will always be exploited to the disadvantage of the West, if possible. But the first year of discussions suggests that if the West remains united, meaningful results are possible in Stockholm.

The meeting between Secretary Shultz and Foreign Minister Gromyko in January will, we hope, lead to a common understanding as to the subject and objectives of negotiations on a whole range of nuclear issues. We hope, also, that in this same spirit the nations participating in the Stockholm Conference may be able in the course of 1985 to make progress towards more stable and cooperative relations and an easing of military confrontation. Whatever the success of other negotiations in reducing the level of arms and men, formidable and potentially devastating military power will exist for a long time to come. While our nations strive to reduce the level of armaments, we must also strive in Stockholm to reduce to the vanishing point the risk of a war that no one wants.

As the Stockholm Conference convened nearly one year ago, President Reagan spoke of Soviet-American relations in a way which, I think, sums up the American attitude towards this enterprise. He said: "Strength and dialogue go hand-in-hand. We are determined to deal with our differences peacefully, through negotiations. We are prepared to dicusss the problems that divide us, and to work for practical, fair solutions on the basis of mutual compromise. We will never retreat from negotiations."●

BYU—NATIONAL CHAMPIONS

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the following article appeared in a San Diego newpaper proving once and for all that BYU has rightfully earned the title of National Football Champion. I ask that this article be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The article follows:

BYU—NATIONAL CHAMPIONS

We all agree that the "who beat whom" exercise is meaningless and can be carried to any ridiculous predetermined conclusion, but let's have some fun. Who should be number one?

Should it be Oklahoma? who lost to Kansas, who lost to Vanderbilt, who lost to Tulane, who lost to Pittsburgh, who lost to BYU.

How about Nebraska? who lost to Syracuse, who lost to Navy, who lost to Air Force, who lost to BYU.

Maybe Oklahoma State? who lost to both Oklahoma and Nebraska (see above).

Is it Texas? who lost to Baylor, who lost to BYU.

Or is it Southern Methodist? who not only lost to Texas but to Houston, who lost to Louisville, who lost to Tulsa, who lost to BYU.

What about Washington? who lost to USC, who lost to Notre Dame, who lost to Air Force, who lost to BYU.

Is it Florida? who lost to Miami, who lost to Boston College, who lost to Penn State, who lost to Pittsburgh, who lost to BYU.

Or Auburn? who lost to both Florida and Miami (above).

How about Ohio State? who lost to Purdue, who lost to Iowa, who lost to Penn State, who lost to Pittsburgh, who lost to BYU.

Maybe longshot Cal State Fullerton? who lost to UNLV, who lost to Hawaii, who lost to BYU.

Or South Carolina? who lost to Navy, who lost to Air Force, who lost to BYU.

Texas Christian? who lost to Texas A&M, who lost to Baylor, who lost to BYU.

Florida State lost to Auburn and South Carolina, Louisiana State lost to Notre Dame, and Maryland lost to Vanderbilt (above).

Could it be USC? who lost to UCLA, who lost to Stanford, who lost to Arizona, who lost to Fresno State, who lost to Montana State, who lost to Idaho State, who lost to UTEP (2-8), who lost to New Mexico State (2-9), who lost to West Texas State (3-8), who lost to Wichita State (2-9), who lost to SW Texas State (2-9), who lost to Nicholls State???, who lost to Lamar (2-9), who lost to Rice (1-9), who lost to Baylor (just another BoDiddly Tech who beat Texas), who lost to BYU; Fresno State also lost to Pacific, who lost to Utah State, who lost to BYU. Too bad UTEP and Utah State lost to BYU or they might be number one.

Anyone can see that this exercise is futile and totally inconclusive. However, it is a fact that everybody has lost to somebody who has lost to somebody . . . who has lost to BYU. But more importantly, it is also a fact that nobody has beaten anybody who has beaten BYU, nobody!●

I'LL NEVER SAY I TOLD YOU SO

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, last year I offered, and the Senate considered, legislation which would have temporarily blocked mergers between America's largest oil companies so that their effects could be studied. I did so because of two parallel concerns: First, that the enormous loans required for such acquisitions would place undue pressure on credit markets, and thus raise interest rates; second, I feared that repayment of these huge loans would divert capital away from future exploration efforts.

During the testimony and debates on this issue, I was assured that my concerns were unfounded and my efforts were heresy. The Senate, in its wisdom, then rejected my proposal.

Well, Mr. President, interest rates are down sharply since the period of major acquisitions. This is clearly due to a wide variety of factors, and we will probably never know the true extent to which oil company mergers served to raise interest rates.

However, exploration rates of major oil companies are a more objective determination. In this regard, I was especially interested to note a recent Salomon Bros. Inc., report, published December 3, 1984, which states:

Major oil company U.S. exploration and production expenditures are indicated to be modestly below the total of 1984—primarily as a result of the recent large oil company mergers.

Further down in this publication, Salomon Bros. states:

For the 18 major oil companies surveyed, U.S. exploration and production expenditures in 1985 are indicated to decline by less than 1 percent from 1984, which may seem disappointing to many. This is primarily a function of the major acquisitions that took place in the industry in 1984. The combinations of Mobil and Superior, Chevron and Gulf, Phillips and Aminoil, and Texaco and Getty will all spend less than the companies individually would have spent in 1985 because of the combined companies' higher debt levels and their desire to reduce these levels. Excluding these combinations, the major companies indicated that their spending will rise moderately.

In the interest of reducing printing costs, I will not insert the entire publication in the RECORD. However, I will make copies available to any who wish to have one. Also, I would be delighted to discuss its contents. I even promise that I will try not to say "I told you so."

S. 259—PROFESSIONAL SPORTS COMMUNITY PROTECTION ACT OF 1985

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, it is time to call a halt to the game of musical chairs that is sweeping professional sports.

In city after city, public officials and community leaders find themselves powerless to prevent the loss of a professional sports franchise to another community. What are city officials to do with an empty stadium? How do they repay outstanding building obligations? What do they tell fans who have for years loyally supported a team that carries their own name?

The virtually unbridled freedom of club owners is being used to foment bidding wars among cities. The loss of a franchise is deleterious to a community, in terms of both its status and its economic base.

The instability in professional sports arises from the inability of the leagues to regulate transfers of franchises.

What we have in professional sports—save for baseball, where league authority is solidly established, as a matter of law—is increasingly destructive chaos. Examples abound. The football Eagles were ransomed by Philadelphia from a move to Phoenix. The Colts abandoned Baltimore for Indianapolis. The football Cardinals hold St. Louis in a state of uncertainty and torment. The basketball Kings announced this week that they intend to leave Kansas City for the Sacramento area.

I would emphasize that what we do in Congress will not decide whether the football Cardinals remain in St. Louis or the Kings stay in Kansas City. Congress cannot and should not attempt to award franchises to specific cities. What we must do is to set the rules which will impose reasonable standards of fairness and responsibility on the conduct of franchise owners. If our bill were to help keep the Cardinals in St. Louis and the Kings in Kansas City, there would be no Senator more jubilant that I. But this legislation cannot guarantee a happy ending for a particular community. In the final analysis, only the community and the club can create a stable and lasting relationship.

In some instances, a transfer may be justified. But in others, it clearly is not, as where an owner is making good profits and leaves town with no regard for the fans and the community who helped make the team a success.

Mr. President, today I join my colleague, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. EAGLETON], in sponsoring the Professional Sports Community Protection Act of 1985. The purpose of the bill is to return stability to professional sports leagues with respect to the issue of franchise relocations.

The court decisions following the Oakland Raiders' move to Los Angeles in 1980 provided the spark for teams capriciously deciding to shift locations. The National Football League [NFL] was sued by the Raiders for enforcing its rule which, at that time, required approval of three-fourths of the league's team owners before a move could take place. The NFL was found to be acting unlawfully to prevent the Raiders' move. Presently, the NFL has a $50 million treble damages judgment pending against it in connection with the lawsuits surrounding the Raiders' case.

As a result of the recent court rulings, professional sports leagues are unsure whether they have a lawful rule to enforce decisions to deny franchise relocations. The NFL was forced to stand idly by as the Colts moved from Baltimore. Similarly, the league was unable to act in the case of the Philadelphia Eagles.

Clearly, the NFL cannot guarantee franchise stability under existing Federal law. At the same time, the National Basketball Association [NBA] is engaged in litigation over last year's move of the Clippers' franchise from San Diego to Los Angeles. The National Hockey League [NHL] successfully prevented a move of the St. Louis team, but now finds itself facing a court challenge to the legality of this action.

My State of Missouri is painfully aware of the seriousness of the situation surrounding franchise moves. The St. Louis Cardinals football team engaged in discussions with officials from another city, exploring the possibility of relocation, while civic leaders fight to keep the team in St. Louis. The Cardinals have flourished in St. Louis over the past 25 years.

In the past season, the Cardinals were in playoff contention until the last week of the football season. The success of this team is attributable in part to the community's support. The fans of St. Louis have supported the Cardinals through thick and thin. It is St. Louis' team.

On the other side of the State, the Kansas City Kings basketball team is seeking league approval for a move to Sacramento. Kansas City built Kemper Arena with the Kings in mind. While Kemper is a multipurpose facility that is put to a variety of uses, the loss of the Kings would be an economic blow. It would be unconscionable to permit the club to abandon Kansas City with no questions asked, and no answers given.

Our bill would authorize professional football, hockey, basketball, and soccer leagues to enforce league rules regarding relocations, sharing of revenues, and ownership of teams. With regard to relocations, the bill would provide that a team must notify the league and the disaffected community of its intention to relocate at least 6 months before the beginning of a new season. The league would be required to make a determination whether to allow the relocation, after consideration of a series of specific factors. These factors include the adequacy of the playing facility, the team's revenues, the extent of fan support, and the existence of offers to purchase the team at its fair market value and retain it in its present location. Judicial review of the league's decision would be available to both the locality and the owner of the team.

It is my intention, as chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, to hold hearings on professional sports relocation early in the first session of the 99th Congress, and to schedule committee consideration of legislation on an expedited basis.●

● Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, professional sports leagues are currently in a state of chaos.

To bring order out of chaos, my colleagues and I have introduced a bill, S. 259, the Professional Sports Community Protection Act of 1985, that seeks to restore to the leagues the authority to regulate themselves and the actions of their member clubs—authority that was apparently stripped away as a result of the court decisions following the Raiders' move from Oakland to Los Angeles.

Responsibility is the handmaiden of authority, however, and we give the leagues clear responsibilities along with their authority. Specifically, the leagues must consider, in any proposed team move, carefully drawn criteria that include the team's likely reasons for such a move, but also include the considerable interests of a hometown in keeping the team it has loyally supported.

Our bill, therefore, is premised on two beliefs: stability between sports teams and their communities is in the public interest; and, sports leagues must be permitted to operate in ways that promote their success.

Some professional sports teams display a cavalier and irresponsible attitude toward their hometowns. We have witnessed the abandonment of Baltimore, the raid on Oakland and a near fumble in Philadelphia. Though clearly no team should be forced to stay in a city where it cannot earn a profit, neither should it be able to flit hither and yon in search of an ever higher take at the gate, while ignoring its hometown. This problem is clearly national in scope, and illustrates the growing inability of leagues to police themselves.

Our legislation is a sensible response to this broader concern.

Our bill authorizes professional sports leagues—football, basketball, soccer, and hockey—to enforce league rules on relocations of teams, revenue sharing, and on the ownership of teams. If a team should wish to move, it must file notice of its intentions at least 6 months before the start of the new season. The league would be required to rule on the application to move, but only after considering a series of specific factors—the adequacy of the present playing facilities, the team's revenues, the extent of fan support, and the existence of offers to purchase the team and keep it in its present location. Our bill also gives the team, the local government, and the stadium owners the right of judicial review of league decisions.

Let me point out what this bill does not do. It does not cover baseball, for the simple reason that the Supreme Court has consistently recognized baseball as a unique entity and has allowed it to regulate itself.

We do not mandate that leagues establish franchises in specific cities, nor do we prohibit transfers. In some instances transfers may be appropriate, and I can think of few ways in which the Federal Government could be more intrusive and heavy handed than to require a sports team to be located in a certain town—with no consideration for the practicality of such a proposition. Might we also mandate that these teams have winning records as well?

This bill does not make the Federal Government the referee for professional sports. Instead of projecting the Federal Government into league decisions, this bill provides a legal mechanism for sports leagues to regulate themselves.

To conclude, Mr. President, it is my view that as long as a team is well supported by its community, and is succeeding in its present location reasonably well, it should not move. But let the Congress make it crystal clear that it is the leagues who should make this call, carefully considering the manifest concerns of the community which has rooted for a team, supported it and stood by it in the cellar, and celebrated with it during its moments of triumph.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a summary of S. 259 be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROFESSIONAL SPORTS COMMUNITY PROTECTION ACT OF 1985—INTRODUCED BY SENATORS EAGLETON AND DANFORTH—BILL SUMMARY

The bill clarified that professional sports leagues (limited to football, basketball, hockey and soccer) can establish rules or agreements to:

Block the relocation of a team to a new city; (this limited exemption applies to decisions against but not for relocation);

Pool league revenues to promote comparable division; and Select or terminate a team owner (by majority vote).

A league's determination regarding a proposed relocation must be made;

After a team provides notice six months before commencement of the season in the new location;

After interested parties are allowed to present oral or written testimony;

Only after it considers and makes specific findings on thirteen factors (see § 6(b) which includes offer to purchase team and retain in hometown;) pertaining to the team's likely reasons for a move, and the community interests against such move;

On the basis of whether such a move would be "reasonable and appropriate"; and

Is subject to judicial review in a neutral Federal district court, whereby the league judgment could be set aside if it were not supported by substantial evidence on the record.

The bill specifically disclaims any attempt to affect employment conditions of the team players, or any contract relating to the stadium between the team and either the owner/operator or any other person. The bill preempts any state law that is inconsistent with the above provisions. The bill becomes effective on January 23, 1985.●

PHYLLIS FRANK

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, Marylanders lost a dear friend, and our State an esteemed citizen, when Phyllis Frank died earlier this month at the tragically young age of 51. Phyllis was a person of great warmth, and it was impossible not to be captivated by her good nature and sense of humor. At the same time, she was also a person of formidable energy and purpose. A devoted wife and mother, she was also active in a wide range of community affairs, in Na'Amat Pioneer Women, and she was the first woman to serve as president of the Washington Jewish Community Council.

Above all, Phyllis will be remembered as an extraordinary person of profound commitment, great intelligence, high ideals, and indomitable spirit. These qualities are reflected in an editorial which appeared in the Washington Jewish Week and in the obituary published in the Washington Post, and I submit these two articles for the RECORD.

[From the Washington Jewish Week, Jan. 10, 1985]

PHYLLIS FRANK

Only death could stop Phyllis Frank. When she fell and broke her hip in Israel at the end of the World Zionist Congress two years ago, she flew all the way to Washington before undergoing medical treatment.

Within days, she was mobile—on crutches or in a wheelchair—heading a search committee at the Jewish Community Council, attending meetings for Pioneer Women, traveling to New York for Zionist assemblies, making speeches, hosting receptions in her home, and performing the endless and often thankless tasks that made her a leader.

Phyllis Frank was indefatigable. She would hold a planning meeting at home in the morning, attend a luncheon, and an afternoon meeting, and host a reception for a visiting dignitary in the evening—day in and day out. All the while she enjoyed a rich personal life and worked closely with her husband and children.

She was passionately in love with Israel but not uncritically. A life-long Labor Zionist, she disagreed strongly and vocally with the policies of the Likud government. When she spoke of Israel, her face shone, and she talked softly.

She was a feminist and a pioneer. She was the first woman president in the 50-year history of our Jewish Community Council. Pioneer Women—a women's Zionist organization committed to helping working women—was her particular cause.

She was a fighter. She never walked away from a battle worth pursuing, but she never fought with ill will. She fought for her principles and she fought to win. She never quit.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 2, 1985]

Phyllis G. Frank, 51, a national vice president of the Pioneer Women/Na'Amat, the women's labor zionist organization, who had been president of the Jewish Community Council of Greater Washington from 1978 to 1980, died of cancer Jan. 1 at her home in Silver Spring.

From 1970 to 1973, she had served as president of the greater Washington Council of Pioneer Women/Na'Amat, and was a recipient of its Golda Meir Award and was named its Pioneer of the Year in 1975. She also was a founder of the national organization's Washington legislative task force.

Mrs. Frank was a member of the World Zionist Action Committee, a delegate to the World Zionist Congress, and served on the board of the World Labor Zionist Movement.

She also had been active in political affairs, serving as coordinator of Rep. Michael Barnes' (D-Md.) 1984 campaign among senior citizens, and as a member of his finance committee. She was a member of his committee dealing with nomination to the military service academies and was a member of the 19th state legislative scholarship committee.

Mrs. Frank was a native of Jersey City, N.J., and a graduate of Simmons College. She moved here in the 1950s, and in 1960 was a labor relations analyst with the Air Transport Association.

Survivors include her husband, Morton, a son, Stuart, a daughter, Wynne Frank, a brother, William E. Gold, and her stepmother, Lillian Gold, all of Silver Spring.

DEFICITS AND JUSTICE

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, the most pressing task before our Nation today is to draw up a budgetary plan that will lower the deficit, maintain the recovery and reduce unemployment. But it should be disturbing to all of us that some of the proposals seem to focus only on the simplest and most immediate bottom line objective of expenditure reduction.

Our colleague, the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS] has warned us that we must look at the long-term effects of these budget proposals and ask the most fundamental of questions: What are the proper and vital tasks of Government that must remain after all of our budgetary pruning? He has addressed this difficult question directly and concisely on the opposite-the-editorial page in the New York Times:

It is not what we cut that should be our emphasis but rather what we consider important enough to retain because we are convinced that it is right.

Every Senator, and indeed every citizen who cares about the long-term direction of our country and the fulfillment of its constitutional objectives, should test his budgetary ideas against this yardstick.

Mr. President, I ask that the full article from the New York Times of January 25 appear at this point in the RECORD.

The article follows:

A THREAT TO THE REPUBLIC: DEBTMAIL

(By Charles McC. Mathias)

WASHINGTON.—By now, there cannot be a single literate person in the United States who is not aware that the country is in a very dangerous financial situation. Since the first of the year, almost as many newspaper column inches have been lavished on the Federal deficit and what should be done about it as were devoted to the Super Bowl.

This is an extraordinary state of affairs. But we are in extraordinary fiscal straits: the national debt has virtually doubled in four years. The entire economy is holding its breath to see whether or not the Administration and the Congress have the intestinal fortitude to deal seriously with the deficit.

But while the deficit is a clear and present danger to the Republic, we must make sure that in our efforts to eliminate or at least reduce it we do not create new threats to the Republic.

One such threat, "debtmail," is very much in the air. Alarm over the red ink is being used by those with narrow views of the role of Government to force the majority to savage, starve and abandon important programs. "Debtmail" differs from blackmail only in the nature of the fear that is used to coerce action that is against the interests of the victim. We must not succumb to "debtmail" while alternatives exist. Revenue levels are not fixed in stone. In fact, many Americans are prepared to contribute more if that will restore the health of the economy and maintain a free and just society.

In all of what will surely be a painful process, the very purpose of Government must be kept constantly in mind. The Preamble to the Constitution sets forth that purpose concisely: It is to "establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." The economic decisions we make in this time of crisis should promote, not obstruct, those fundamental objectives of our constitutional Government.

Justice must be viewed as a broader concept than merely the judicial process. Justice is the goal of our society. And in no aspect of life, for example, is justice more vital than in matters of money—there must be equity in sharing costs and in sharing benefits. To require one group to surrender benefits while another retains untaxed or undertaxed income raises questions of equity. In one case, sacrifice may mean surrender of a benefit; in another, it may mean higher taxes, but the two must be comparable.

The constitutional mandate to provide for the common defense demands that we exercise judgment and prudence. The question we must try to answer is: "How much is enough?" There is no absolute answer. But common sense suggests that there is both an upper and a lower limit of effective expenditure. We must fix our goal in the area between those extremes.

The mandate to promote the general welfare clearly forces us to consider alternatives at every step of the deficit reduction process. We must think about education and housing and health care as elements of the general welfare while we also consider that a sound economy and stable currency are necessary to the general welfare.

We will fail the nation if we only consider cutting expenditures to reduce the deficit. The process must be affirmative, not simply negative. We must also consider what we should spend to achieve the constitutional objectives. It is not what we cut that should be our emphasis but rather what we consider important enough to retain because we are convinced that it is right.

It is certainly true that many of our economic troubles derive from 40 years of errors but it is equally true that some colossal mistakes are of very recent origin, including the failure to recognize that the deficit had become a firestorm raging out of control until it was too late to apply normal methods of correction. Our job now is not to compound those errors by mindless budget cuts and senseless abdication of social responsibility. We must move forcefully but we must move only after we have projected a course for the nation as far into the future as possible and found that it is clear of rocks and shoals.●

THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague, Senator KENNEDY, in support of the passage of the equal rights amendment by the 99th Congress.

This is the 31st consecutive Congress in which an equal rights amendment has been introduced. We will continue to introduce and support the ERA in every Congress yet to come, until it is passed by the Congress and ratified by three-quarters of the States. It is our sacred duty to join in the struggle American women have pursued for equal rights and equal opportunities, for more than a century.

In 1984, we celebrated the achievements of two outstanding American women. That year marked the centennial anniversary of the birth of Eleanor Roosevelt, a most dedicated and courageous first lady and U.N. delegate, and the first nomination of a woman for the Vice Presidency on a major party ticket, Geraldine A. Ferraro. The achievements of these two distinguished women are an inspiration to reaffirm our commitment to passage of the equal rights amendment.

The American movement for women's rights, one might say, began in Waterloo, NY. In July 1848, five women met at the home of Jane and Richard Hunt in Waterloo. There, Elizabeth Cady Stanton of Seneca Falls, Mary Ann McClintock of Waterloo, Marta Coffin Wright of nearby Auburn, Lucretia Coffin Mott of Philadelphia and Mrs. Hunt planned the first women's rights convention held at Seneca Falls, and later wrote the "Declaration of Sentiments." Modeled on our Declaration of Independence, the Declaration of Sentiments proclaimed that—

> All men and women are created equal: that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

It was endorsed at the Seneca Falls Convention, on July 19 and 20, 1848.

The only controversial matter raised at that convention was the proposal to extend the franchise to women. It was 72 years before the Nation heeded Elizabeth Cady Stanton's call for the vote for women. It took but 10 months in 1980, however, to enact legislation I proposed to establish a Women's Rights Historic Park at Seneca Falls and Waterloo, commemorating this call.

In 1923, Alice Paul—a courageous and largely unheralded campaigner for women's rights—wrote the draft equal rights amendment. And that year, Seneca Falls hosted another women's rights convention; one for the National Women's Party. That party, endorsed Ms. Paul's draft amendment, carrying on the work begun in Seneca Falls in 1848. The vote for women, they knew, was only a step toward full equality.

That same year, Representative Daniel R. Anthony, a nephew of Susan B. Anthony and Senator Charles Curtis introduced Alice Paul's equal rights amendment in the 68th Congress. It was reintroduced in every subsequent session until Congress passed it in 1972. The ERA's supporters did not despair during a half century of waiting for Congress to pass the ERA, nor did we despair during 10 years of waiting for the States to ratify it. We do not despair now. I am here today to reaffirm dedication to the equal rights amendment, and ensure that it does become a part of the supreme law of the land.●

HIGHER EDUCATION'S UNFINISHED BUSINESS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, Father Timothy J. Healy, S.J., the president of Georgetown University and the outgoing chairman of the American Council on Education, delivered a major address at the November 1984 joint annual meeting of the American Council on Education and the National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges in Denver, CO. Father Healy's address "Higher Education's Unfinished Business" emphasizes the important unfinished agenda that remains for higher education in the education of minority-group Americans at all levels of post-secondary education.

Father Healy has been and is a leader of higher education for many years and in many areas. While Georgetown has recently received notoriety for its 1984 NCAA championship basketball team, the university under Tim Healy's able stewardship has carved a unique niche in foreign language instruction and international studies, in improving the overall quality of instruction in higher education and for providing educational opportunities for minorities in its undergraduate, graduate and professional schools. Father Healy has lead by example—providing both quality and equity in higher education. He continues to teach English each semester.

The picture which Father Healy paints of minority access to higher education is not a pretty one. The lofty goal of equal opportunity in higher education, which the Congress established for the Nation in 1965, has not yet been achieved and we are making less progress toward the attainment of our goal today than we were in the 1970's.

Minority groups are all younger than the white population with an average median age of 24.9 compared to 31.3 for whites. Therefore, the college age cohort for minority groups will increase at a time of decline for whites.

Blacks experienced proportional enrollment declines at all postsecondary levels, though they have registered slight increases in absolute numbers since 1976.

Hispanics leveled off in proportional shares of bachelor's and doctoral degrees, but declined in master's degrees.

Hispanics and blacks experienced increases in the number of high school graduates from 1975 to 1980, but the percentage of high school graduates enrolling in college for both groups declined.

Minority enrollment among black Americans and Hispanic Americans, in 4-year institutions of higher education, have leveled off or declined since 1978. The American Council on Education's Office of Minority Concerns has reported in "Minorities in Higher Education" and Father Healy emphasizes that there are serious problems of minority enrollment and retention at all levels of higher education.

President Healy closed his speech with a challenge for higher education in America—I believe his words are equally appropriate for us in the Senate—

. . . For too many of our Black and Hispanic citizens this (American) dream has been too long deferred. Colleges and universities, public and private, can work no dramatic miracles—but we can help. I think we should.

I ask that Father Healy's address be printed in the RECORD.

The address follows:

AMERICAN COUNCIL ON EDUCATION/NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF STATE UNIVERSITIES AND LAND GRANT COLLEGES

This morning I would like to use the time allotted to me to talk about one of the major unfinished pieces of business that lies before all of American higher education, both public and private. I am, by the way, delighted that I can address a problem that applies to both sectors, one for which both bear a responsibility, and which both must work together to solve. Sometimes having one unquestioned piece of common agenda is more helpful than all the rusty spears we wave at each other.

Since the passage of Brown versus the Board of Education, and above all since the passage of the Civil Rights Act in 1964, minority Americans have made great strides in higher education. Let's look at some of the facts. The number of black youngsters who finished high school has increased from 10 percent immediately before the war to 70 percent today. By 1980, roughly 54 percent of young Hispanic Americans were completing high school, as were 52 percent of Native Americans.

When we turn to college, the growth has been somewhat slower but still strong. In 1970 only 5 percent of 25-year-old and older black Americans, 5 percent of Hispanics and 4 percent of Native Americans had completed four years of college. By 1981 these numbers had improved: more than 8 percent of young blacks, 7 percent of Hispanics and 6 percent of Native Americans had finished four years of college. All three lag behind the white completion rate of 17 percent.

The increase in graduate school attendance was slower. During the 60's and 70's black graduate enrollments increased from 4 to 6 percent of the total, Hispanic enrollments rose from below 1 percent to almost 3 percent and Native American enrollment rose to 2 percent. Up until the beginning of the 1980's, in other words, we had worked no miracles, but we had made steady, significant and obvious progress. Let me emphasize that Native American and Asians are also our concern; however, my numerical citations are primarily confined to blacks and Hispanics.

We can see how important further growth in higher educational accomplishment is if we look at the national statistics which spell out the future of our two great minority populations. White America is both aging and shrinking. In 1970 the average age for white Americans reached up into the 30's. Demographers tell us that the high fertility years are between 20 and 29. The average age of black Americans is now 25 and of Hispanic Americans 22. Not only are minority numbers growing significantly, but they are also growing disproportionately. Those in the peak child-bearing years are bound to have more children than whites in the lower child-bearing years above 30.

The decline we are now beginning to notice sets up a serious agenda for us. Like all administrators I am more comfortable with feel than with facts, then let me deal thus with a perception that many of us have, and which is growing throughout the nation. The integration of our colleges and graduate schools is slowing. Nationally, college by college and university by university we are pushing equality of access (the academic term for integration) onto the back burner. All of us acknowledge the ideal of integration, but our zeal for keeping access open, and for working at the integration of faculties, has slipped; in some institutions it has disappeared.

The figures bear this out. In 1975, 35 percent of young Hispanics went to college, and recently the figure has fallen below 29 percent. In that same year 32 percent of young blacks went to college and that figure is now below 27 percent. During the same period of time white enrollments remained stable. When we turn to graduate school enrollments we face even more serious decline. Black enrollments in graduate school have declined over the past 5 years from over 6 percent to 4.2 percent and Hispanics have stayed stable at roughly 2.5 percent. For both groups more than three-fourths of the Ph.D.'s awarded are in education and the social sciences.

I give these grim figures about graduate schools because it has seemed to me all along that ultimately if we want to integrate America's colleges and universities, to make sure that black and Hispanic youngsters have access in proportion to their numbers in the population, in this as in everything else we do, the key to the arch is the faculty. Unless we can place an appropriate percentage of black and Hispanic faculty members on all our faculties and in all our departments, we will never make higher education a saleable product to minority students.

Why don't black and Hispanic students come to graduate schools, and above all why don't they come to those disciplines which open up for them access to the professorate? The first reason is the obvious one that has dogged all our efforts at integration since the very beginning, it costs too much. On the other hand there are other reasons that do not depend upon money that we ought also to consider. For any 21-year-old youngster with a good bachelor's degree, the professorate has certain obvious drawbacks.

First of all it doesn't pay, or even in places where it pays relatively well it pays considerably less than many other careers. Black and Hispanic young people can make the same market analysis that other immigrant peoples have brought into major urban universities for years. The first educational wave goes for law, accounting and, when it can, medicine. All three pay, all three are independent, and all three give a man or a woman the sense of carrying professional skills on his or her back which no one can take away.

A second reason is that professorial degrees involve an agonizing deferral of gratification. Any Ph.D. is a long and hard struggle, and at times, particularly in the hard sciences, has an aleatory cast to it that is frightening.

Finally, any black, Hispanic or Native American youngster contemplating a major graduate school is bound to feel, even by eyeballing it, that the dice are loaded against him. There simply are not enough black, Hispanic or Native American professors around to make his own success credible.

Experience tells us that all of these—the first-generation's clustering in certain "immediate payoff" professions, a lack of sufficient faculty role models, and limited access to graduate education—are major obstacles to increasing the ranks of minority professors. I am sufficiently worried at what appear now to be rising barriers that I have agreed to accept the chairmanship of ACE's Commission on Minorities in Higher Education in order to explore ways of getting them down. I might also note that several sessions at this annual meeting are devoted to serious minority issues which I urge you to attend. And the Board of Directors of ACE has just corroborated my concerns by adopting yesterday three statements on equity, quality and affirmative action.

We have serious answers to all the problems I spoke of before. Of course the professorate pays less, but there are solid reasons for undertaking it, and they are hugely valid in every human sense. Of course it involves deferral, but the profession itself is worth the wait. How does a youngster come to hear our answers, and how do we make them credible to him? The answer we know; he hears them from faculty members. He finds in the course of undergraduate schooling and through his graduate career a set of teachers and scholars, who represent for him a fineness of life, a fullness of human endeavor both understandable and attractive.

None of us in universities have to beat the bushes for white candidates, they come of their own will. They come because they see us, trust us, understand us, and (with some reservations) admire what we do and believe that they can share the reasons we have for doing it. The conclusion is simple. Until there are sufficient numbers of black, Hispanic and Native American faculty members serving on undergraduate and graduate faculties, we will never make the academic career believable to black, Hispanic and Native American young men and women.

I recognize that there's something of a circular trap here, like the problem faced by anyone who wants to write music. You can't publish a song until you are a member of ASCAP, and you can't become a member of ASCAP until you have published a song. Obviously ASCAP acquires new members, so somewhere the logic breaks down, reality takes over, and as the philosophers remarked, "Solvitur ambulando." None of us have ever bought the marvelously absurd conclusion of Tom Stoppard's philosophy prof who analyzed Zeno's conundrum about the arrow and concluded that "St. Sebastian died of fright."

Where does that then leave us. One more demographic comment is germane. I said before that the poor are expensive so that financing is a problem. On the other hand minority populations are large, and if California is going to be a majority-minority in the year 2000 so will 53 major American cities. In more than 15 states minority populations have already developed the kind of political clout which makes them sedulously courted by politicians, both local and national. The problem I am addressing, how to strengthen the academic and intellectual leadership of minority groups, like most other American economic problems, is amenable to a political solution. For both public and private universities, the one great hopeful sign on the landscape is that minority populations are developing political power. If our willingness to serve can avail itself of that power, enter into alliance with it, and draw upon its strength, we may have a solution to our financial problem.

On the other hand, all the money in the world will not solve the psychological barriers that lie around graduate education for minority young people. Here is where I would like to propose we ourselves should go to work, seriously and generally. What do we need? We need first of all a special faculty effort to persuade talented black and Hispanic undergraduates of the need for them in the professorate, and the value and indeed joy of our work. In addition we need a national university effort to find and to help black and Hispanic undergraduates into graduate school. That doesn't mean an effort to find and help weak condidates into ersatz degrees. Our national enrollments are over 12 million, and over a million of these students are black and Spanish speaking. Surely from among a million young men and women we can find several thousands who can and should be made welcome to professorial graduate education, especially in the humanities and the hard sciences.

It's easy to say that there ought to be special faculty efforts to find and hire minority faculty members, but this can only be done when the market holds enough candidates to make such hiring possible. Our challenge now is not recruitment on to the faculty, but recruitment into the graduate schools. Recruitment to the faculty will come in its own time, and all the planners tell us that faculty hiring will pick up sharply within this decade.

I don't think any such effort can be mounted by individual universities, even the well heeled, and it would present insuperable difficulties to those who are struggling to keep graduate programs alive. Therefore we need also a special effort of all our associations, private and public, small and large, including ACE, to find federal and foundation and corporate funds to make national minority graduate recruitment possible. Here is where our associations and universities should begin involving black and Hispanic political leaders who in some states and in many cities already have the political power to support the effort.

Several fellowship programs currently exist for minorities, but together they provide perhaps 500 new awards per year. I submit that such levels are just not sufficient. In the Department of Education we have the GPOP program with an average award amount of $8,400. This award is inadequate and must be subsidized by every institution that accepts students who hold it. In the NSF we have minority graduate fellowships but, alas, only 50 per year. In the NIH we have an excellent program, the MARC program (Minority Assistance for Research Careers), but it is expensive and still too small. We should set a goal of 2,000 new minority fellowship awards, above all in the humanities and sciences, and make it an institutional and association priority among all of us to achieve such a level by 1986.

I am proposing, then, a serious new commitment of this nation's resources for graduate fellowships for minority group members. To make a difference, it would require the full cooperation of federal agencies, foundations, corporations, associations and universities in this endeavor. From my vantage point, I believe that the American Council on Education should assume an important leadership role in this effort; this would be consistent with its own programs to advance minorities, its experience with the Fellows program and the Senior Fulbright program, and its unique position of responsibility to promote the good of all higher education. If all of us are committed, the task can be accomplished.

Let us for instance take average graduate tuition as $5,000. If we allow $10,000 for living expenses and figure that each student will take four years to complete a degree, we are talking about an investment of $60,000 behind each doctorate. If we aimed at supporting about 2,000 students every year, we are talking about a national program that would cost 30 million dollars a year (102 million dollars when it's fully functioning). Put some of that money into loans rather than grants and that total can be reduced.

If the 200 major graduate institutions in the United States got together behind such a program, if they were supported by black, Hispanic and Native American leaders across the nation, I think it would be possible to persuade the federal government and some major foundations and corporations that it would be a good idea to put a large number of minority professors into the nation's colleges and universities. The simple truth is that within 20 years the job could be done.

Couple these efforts with the emerging sensitivity in our private corporate leadership to the changing demographic state of the nation and I believe we could make even more rapid progress. Assume several major foundations were to join together to get this effort started. Federal efforts could then be added to expand our initiative. The federal government could provide either direct support or tax incentives for corporate involvement or both. This would allow a cap on direct federal expenditures, while building in the elements of long term success in this country; i.e., a national sense of responsibility, the political support of our new demographics, and the combined strength of both public and private institutions.

If the problem is as real as the numbers tell us, and if the key to it really lies within the professorial graduate schools, then this solution doesn't seem either impossible or, to pick Aristotle's more powerful category, improbable. As always in our democracy, we have to want to make it work. Perhaps the recent sight of over 90 million American citizens voting for their political future reminds you as it does me of the strength and beauty of this republic. It has always been for me a kind of vast corporate dream—and eight years of study in Europe only taught me how richly I share it and how deeply proud of it I am. For too many of our black and Hispanic fellow citizens this dream has been too long deferred. Colleges and universities, private and public, can work no dramatic miracles—but we can help. I think we should.

ADVANCE NOTIFICATION OF PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon receipt of such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Pursuant to an informal understanding, the Department of Defense has agreed to provide the committee with a preliminary notification 20 days before transmittal of the official notification. The official notification will be printed in the RECORD in accordance with previous practice.

I wish to inform Members of the Senate that such a notification has been received.

Interested Senators may inquire as to the details of this advance notification at the office of the Committee on Foreign Relations, room SD 423.

The notification follows:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC, January 25, 1985.
In reply refer to: I-16035/84ct.
Dr. M. GRAEME BANNERMAN,
Deputy Staff Director, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR DR. BANNERMAN: By letter dated 18 February 1976, the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, indicated that you would be advised of possible transmittals to Congress of information as required by Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act. At the instruction of the Department of State, I wish to provide the following advance notification.

The Department of State is considering an offer to a Middle Eastern country for major defense equipment tentatively estimated to cost in excess of $14 million.

Sincerely,

GLENN A. RUDD,
Acting Director.

GENERAL PARTAIN

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, today Gen. Edward Allen Partain will turn over the command of the 5th U.S. Army and retire after over 35 years in the U.S. armed services.

We in Arkansas, especially those citizens and friends in his hometown of Paragould, are proud of the contributions General Partain has made during his years of service.

A graduate of the U.S. Military Academy, he has risen through the ranks until he received appointment as lieutenant general on January 19, 1983.

During his distinguished career, General Partain has received the Silver Star, Legion of Merit, Distinguished Flying Cross, Bronze Star Medal with Oak Leaf Cluster, Air Medals, Army Commendation Medal with V Device and three Oak Leaf Clusters, Purple Heart with two Oak Leaf Clusters, Combat Infantryman Badge, Master Parachutist Badge, and the Army Aviator Badge.

As an Arkansan and an American, I thought it most appropriate to pay tribute to him today and thank him for his loyal service to our Nation.●

FLOODING IN PENNSYLVANIA

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to join my colleague, ARLEN SPECTER, in introducing a package of flood control legislation which would authorize a flood control project in each of four disaster-prone areas of Pennsylvania. Passage of this legislation would be a big step toward taming the natural conditions which presently threaten the lives and property of hundreds of thousands of my constituents.

The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania is no stranger to the havoc and dangers of flooding. The great Johnstown floods of 1889 and 1936 are but two of the scores of natural disasters which have been visited upon our heads and homes. Pennsylvania communities have been flooded as recently as 1972, when several cities along the Susquehanna River were devastated by rains which followed in the wake of Hurricane Agnes.

The legislation Senator SPECTER and I have introduced is designed to create flood control projects in the four areas most heavily damaged by the 1972 floods—the cities and suburbs of Wilkes-Barre, Harrisburg, Lock Haven, and Milton, PA. Since their founding moments, these four communities have stood in the shadow of an unfortunate confluence of geography and natural conditions which all but courts disaster. The flood control legislation we have proposed would protect these towns from a recurrence of floods of the intensity of those suffered in 1972.

The projects for which I seek authorization are not new to this Chamber, Mr. President. Four bills identical to those before us today were introduced as long ago as the 97th Congress. In the 98th Congress, $1.2 million was appropriated for the continuation of planning and engineering for these projects. The spadework has been done. It is to get on with the task of turning these long-studied, long-needed proposals into reality.

Mr. President, the events which necessitated the introduction of these measures occurred more than a dozen years ago. The citizens of Pennsylvania who live in flood-prone areas deserve a permanent solution to their problems soon. In 1972, Hurricane Agnes took scores of lives and caused over $50 million worth of damage. The next time floods strike central Pennsylvania, the cost could be double or even triple the amount borne 13 years ago. I urge my colleagues to pass this legislation as soon as possible. Thank you.●

INVOCATION OF MONSIGNOR ROMAGOSA

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, all of us frequently place the articles and statements of others in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Sometimes we do so to make a point. Other times we do so to curry political favor. All too seldom do we pay the tribute of publication solely for reasons of eloquence.

Today, I wish to pay such a tribute. During November of last year at the American Petroleum Institute's annual convention, Monsignor Romagosa delivered a somewhat unusual invocation. At first glance, the humor which so richly dots his prayer masks its insightfulness. But, upon reflection, one cannot help but be impressed by the respectful acknowledgment of our Lord, His power, and His farsightedness.

His words speak better than mine, and I therefore ask that a copy of Monsignor Romagosa's invocation be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The invocation follows:

PROCEEDINGS

Msgr. ELMO ROMAGOSA. Almighty Lord of the eternal energies, we ask Your blessing upon the officers and members of the American Petroleum Institute and their guests here assembled.

Oh, master of the universe, You have so made matter that it follows a wonderful pattern of laws. We thank You for storing gasses and liquids and solids for us in the depths of the earth as energy sources for human living.

You have compressed within the tiny space of the atom a dynamic and terrifying force as a mirrored reflection of Your almighty power. In a drop of oil, in a jet of gas, You have preserved for centuries unnumbered the heat and light of the sun.

Oh, director of all operations, both downstream and upstream, grant to the executives here gathered the prophetic vision of Isiah, in establishing time related R&D objectives in our American free market system, and grant them, as well, the endurance of Joshua in coordinating their implementation, undaunted by those holding divergent views.

And finally, make them all as patient as Job, as they face the inevitable prospect of blowouts and dry holes to say nothing of continuing price controls on natural gas.

Oh, Divine Custodian of strategic petroleum reserves, grant to all API members the understanding that to them, SPR should also signify Serious Personal Responsibility so that when life's final well has been capped, the sweet crude of Your love may be for them a pledge of the gold of life enternal,

Amen.●

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, each February our Nation celebrates Black History Month. This celebration serves to increase our awareness of the contributions of blacks to our country—contributions which are a source of pride for all Americans.

In 1926, Carter G. Woodson, a black scholar and historian, established Negro History Week to dramatize often omitted black accomplishments in American history. This celebration, expanded to 1 full month, recalls the outstanding contributions of blacks to the growth and betterment of this country. This time is used to educate and reeducate all Americans on the essential role of blacks in American history.

In Michigan, we are proud of our black heroes and heroines. They include Sojourner Truth, who helped lead our country out of the dark days of slavery; Elijah McCoy, a noted inventor of steam engines; American diplomat and Nobel laureate Ralph Bunche; Rosa Parks, who sparked the civil rights movement by refusing to give up her seat on a bus; and Joe Louis, the "Brown Bomber," who proved to be one of boxing's greatest by holding the heavyweight title longer than any other man.

These individuals represent the millions of great black Americans who have so importantly contributed to our country. Each February, we are especially proud to thank all black Americans. With this thanks, we must also pledge further progressive application of the equality, justice, and opportunity which we promise to all Americans.●

ADM. JAMES D. WATKINS' SPEECH ON STRATEGIC DEFENSE

(By request of Mr. DOLE, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, today I am pleased to offer to my colleagues for the record a speech presented by the Chief of Naval Operations, Adm. James D. Watkins to the Los Angeles Rotary Club, earlier this month. His remarks give us one more clear vision of the need to move beyond the doctrine of mutually assured destruction. The strategic defense initiative, a research program designed to explore nonnuclear options for the defense of the United States against nuclear attack, is a moral and commonsense approach to the challenge we face today to deter aggression, reduce the threat of nuclear war and preserve the peace.

Admiral Watkins reveals a statement made by a top Government official who said, "I believe defensive systems, which prevent attack, are not the cause of the arms race, but constitute a factor preventing the death of people * * * maybe an antimissile system is more expensive than offensive system, but it is designed to preserve human lives." Another high ranking military officer explained that strategic defense systems, "Destroy the fabric of the enemies society are a cause of instability because the insensitive to strike first is always present." Neither of these statements are the words of American defense authorities or the Reagan administration, but are instead statements made over 20 years ago by Soviet Premier Aleksei Kosygin and Soviet Gen. Nicolai Tolenski.

The Soviet message has now changed. President Chernenko has labeled President Reagan's strategic defense initiative as "both futile and dangerous."

I commend Admiral Watkins for his concise and timely speech and recommend it to my colleagues, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

ROADS DIVERGING—DESPAIR OR HOPE: YOUR CHOICE

Today, I'm not going to give my standard address to Rotary members—which I refer to as "Navy 101." So, I'm not going to tell you that we've emerged dramatically from the gray zone of fighting uncertainty extant in the Navy just four years ago, into a spirited and winning Navy. I'm not going to tell you that we are the most ready Navy since the end of World War II, or that we have the best young recruits coming in, best retention of experienced sailors and hence the best preofessional personnel base on record. I'm not going to tell you about the Soviet threat, with its incredible Soviet military might which grows apace and at a significantly higher rate than that of either our own or Western world allies. I'm not going to talk about our Navy's direct involvement in helping to deter state-sponsored terrorism generated by irresponsible and fanatical leaders who don't seem to comprehend—or don't really care—what permanent damage they inflict on civilized world families. As Chief of Naval Operations, I've given speeches and written many articles on each of these topics, any of which can be made available at another time to those interested.

No, today I'm going to take off my hat as Chief of Naval Operations and put on my hat as a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and talk about something technically non-Navy, but something absolutely crucial to us all. For our nation has reached a critical cross roads in the nuclear age, with two paths emanating therefrom. One badly worn path leads to continued seeming hopelessness in offensive nuclear arms escalation. The other is fresh and offers new hope of world extrication from the increasingly unpalatable concept of the mutual assured destruction of mankind, for too long the accepted deterrent counter strategy to initiation of nuclear war.

Most Americans find this concept morally repugnant. Witness the almost frenetic groping for alternatives. The other and more enlightened path is called the strategic defense initiative. It deserves dedication of highest levels of attention and intellectual thought over the next few years.

Two years ago, on March 23, 1983, President Reagan courageously offered this nation—and our allies—a new vision of the future. He looked beyond today's peace, based upon offensive nuclear weapons pointed at one another, toward a stronger, more stable peace based on the concept of defense. He looked beyond a hopeless view of free nations having to deter attacks solely by threatening retaliation, toward a more hopeful future of deterring attacks by defending against them. He looked beyond the tiresome and continuing build-up of ballistic missiles toward a better future in which they would no longer be militarily or economically competitive. This was his vision—and the essence of what is properly entitled his strategic defense initiative.

Today, discussion of strategic defense continues to fill our papers. Some deride this concept as "Star Wars." Others call it "prudent policy and common sense." World-wide interest in this subject has been increasingly intense in recent weeks as post-election strategic doors are cracked open again.

Let me share a revealing anecdote with you: When asked about a proposed moratorium on strategic missile defenses at a press conference, a top government official once replied—"I believe defensive systems, which prevent attack, are not the cause of the arms race, but constitute a factor preventing the death of people . . ." This official continued by noting, "maybe an anti-missile system is more expensive than an offensive system, but it is designed to preserve human lives . . ."

Another top government official, this one a high-ranking military officer, also wrote about strategic defense systems. He explained how offensive nuclear weapons, not defensive systems, "destroy the fabric of the enemy's society and are a cause for instability because the incentive to strike first is always present."

No, these quotes are not from a speech or an article written either this year or last; neither are they words of American defense authorities or Reagan administration officials. Interestingly, they are statements by Soviet Premier Aleksei Kosygin and Soviet General Nicolai Talenski made over twenty years ago.

Strange, isn't it? For the Soviet message has now changed. In fact, we are told the Soviet's focus of attack in upcoming arms control discussions will be against the President's strategic defense initiative. We are told, according to Soviet President Chernenko, that his new concept of defense is "both futile and dangerous . . ." Why the turnaround? What has changed their opinion about strategic defense?

By contrast, here in the United States, we see a more-than-ten-year-history of decrying the value of strategic defense. As you may have read, a group of officials from former administrations only recently wrote in the magazine Foreign Affairs that the President's strategic defense initiative is a "dream . . . an act of folly (that) cannot be achieved." This is not remarkably different from arguments proposed before, by some of these same pundits as early as the 1960's.

On the one hand, we think we understand why the Soviet "Old Guard" does not want to re-espouse strategic defense as their national imperative. On the other, many of us cannot understand why so many of our "Old Guard" continue to espouse the same old strategic counter strategy which not only plays into Soviet hands, but also has been properly assessed by the American people to be an outworn concept on the verge of political and military bankruptcy.

The Soviets now decry strategic defense because they know we have the potential to channel our impressive industrial might into development of effective defenses, possibly defeating their historic communist objectives while altering the course of the nuclear age in favor of all mankind.

As for U.S. critics, skepticism on the part of some is not unknown—a usual reaction to new ideas. This is particularly true, when new ideas go against conventional wisdom.

President Reagan's challenge of strategic defense was just such a bold idea—a watershed—an attempt to break out of a mindset which insists deterrence should be based solely upon offensive nuclear retaliation.

President Reagan made no clarion call to abandon deterrence or forsake arms control efforts; nor did he attempt to spell out specifics about various defensive systems; nor did he authorize building an impregnable dome around this country. The President only challenged this nation—and the world—to see if maybe there was a better means to maintain an effective strategic weapon deterrence in the future than that of avenging our people after unclear attack. In March of 1983, the goals of U.S. national security policy—preservation of security and freedom for ourselves and our allies, as well as the promotion of world peace and stability—did not change.

So, much of the controversy results from a confusion between means and ends; a misreading of the history of defensive systems and arms control; and a refusal to look beyond our current dependency upon offensive nuclear weapons to possible alternatives. Today, let me share with you some thoughts about the President's defense initiative.

To start with, this nation has no choice but to maintain its strategic triad with necessary force modernization. Simultaneously, we must continue to pursue realistic arms control agreements. These two means—means toward our goal and means to the end which is global peace and security—are still inseparably linked.

In fact, it was out of national debate engulfing U.S. nuclear force modernization that the President's vision of a better future blossomed. For he saw—despite growing American spirit and pride—a dark cloud looming on the free world's horizon.

He saw American people, and our allies, wanting something better—deserving something better. The President seized the moment and offered an alternative. This alternative is hope that nuclear blackmail can be relegated to the junk heap of unsavory political devices sometime in the forseeable future. Extraordinary advance in technology now make this possible.

Before describing this alternative further, let's talk a bit about deterrence. Deterrence has been described in many ways, but perhaps Mark Twain best illustrated deterrence with a short story.

"The other day two bulldogs met", Twain explained. "They circled, snarling and growling. Both were bluffing so nothing happened. And they were about to walk off when one of them opened his mouth. He had no teeth. So the other dog tore him to pieces."

Today, if we lacked the teeth of deterrence, we would surely be torn to pieces in this world of violent peace. So, the issue is not whether deterrence should be abandoned—for it cannot be abandoned—but rather what will keep the teeth in deterrence. The issue is how deterrence can best be preserved and strengthened to meet changing strategic circumstances, a growing threat to free societies, and a world of exploding technologies.

Actually, deterrence has evolved slowly since its conception. We have transitioned away from what Secretary Weinberger described last month as "the odd theory that you are safe only if you have no defense whatever," toward a more rational deterrence based on denial of Soviet war aims and threats to what Soviet leaders prize most—foundations of their military and civil power.

Nevertheless, our thinking stagnated in its evolution, concentrating solely on how offensive forces should deter. That is, American strategic policy and strategic forces have remained offense-dominated since the early 1970s until just now when the President suggested we explore ways to transition to a world in which defenses can perhaps play a central role.

Sure, a 100 percent effective defense of both our people and allies, coupled with similar defense against aircraft and cruise missiles, if attainable, would represent a nearly total shift to a defense-dominated world . . . not an unattractive long term wish, but probably unrealistic and well beyond reasonable reach.

But, because of unfounded speculation along these lines, the greatest criticism of defense has centered on the false premise that it needs to be perfect—or not at all. Such is simply not so. Whereas critics correctly recognize devastation would still be immense after a partially defended attack, an illogical conclusion is then drawn that a less-than-perfect defense has no value.

A useful strategic defense does not need to be perfect to contribute to deterrence. Why? Because even less than perfect defenses will deny the Soviets the confidence that they can achieve their goals.

Today, for example, the Soviet Union's nuclear war fighting doctrine requires a high confidence in attainment of stringent damage goals before they will attack. Strategic defense, effective though imperfect, can put these damage goals in question. Resultant uncertainty of success enhances both deterrence and stability.

Critics also fail to recognize that a nuclear threat might not come solely from the Soviet Union. Despite measures to forestall nuclear proliferation, more nations, not fewer, probably will continue to develop these weapons of mass destruction. While it may be extremely difficult to achieve a foolproof defense against the Soviets, total defense against a nation with less nuclear capability is very possible.

Much the same as Lewis Carroll's walrus who, with tears streaming down his face, consumed his friends the oysters, some critics have also charged that defensive measures would create a "Fortress America" that would isolate us from the defense of our allies . . . another red herring. For we are committed—by treaty, morality and self-interest—to aid in the defense of our allies.

We live in an increasingly interdependent world wherein an attack on one of our allies is tantamount to an attack on us all. By treaty commitment and our own national security interests, deterrence does not apply only to attacks on the United States. It is axiomatic, therefore, that strategic defense is being designed to defend allies as well.

Another criticism of strategic defense is that it will sound the death knell for arms control and arms reductions . . . wrong again.

Far from an end to arms control and reductions, a strategic defense concept can enhance both. Through defense, we hope to show the Soviets over time that ballistic missiles have limited military utility. This will induce them to negotiate seriously and eventually join us in a balanced offense/defense strategy. Further, it will provide an incentive for significant arms reductions.

Ballistic missiles, because of their short time of flight and increasing accuracy, are the most destabilizing strategic weapons from our point of view. So, if we can convince the Soviets that, in the future, ballistic missiles will no longer have great value, chances for a turn-down in arms proliferation even in this century are enhanced.

Conversely, those with an opposite point of view say a strategic defense system will merely force the Soviets to up the nuclear ante—that is, force them to increase their arsenal of warheads to ensure that more weapons leak through our defenses to targets. But I say this would only occur if such proliferation could restore effectiveness of their ballistic missile force against an effective defensive system . . . and an assured degree of restoration will not be possible. So, under these circumstances, they are now more likely to sit down and seriously negotiate, and are certainly more likely to avoid nuclear foolishness in the first place, if tempted, in the future.

After all, do you think it is a mere coincidence that they are showing a willingness to talk seriously—just when we are getting serious about strategic defense? As a historical aside, after we decided to build an antiballistic missile system in 1969 the Soviets opened ABM negotiations with us—which they had rejected flatly only two years earlier. Today, our ABM system is defunct while they continue to upgrade their ABM sites around Moscow.

Another stumbling block to realistic arms control—and successful negotiations with the Soviets—has been the problem of verification and compliance. Strategic defense can help hurdle this problem as well. If, because of defensive systems, ballistic missiles become less important, then the value of building more ballistic missiles is reduced. Also, it will not be as important to insist upon a precise count of ballistic missiles if their military utility cannot be restored by relatively small-scale violations of agreed limits.

Strategic defense offers one way to lessen the difficulties and frustrations in the very thorny issue of verification and compliance in arms control . . . particularly in the new world of mobile and relocatable nuclear systems which the Soviets have fielded and have been testing for some time. No known national technical means have yet been developed to enable either the Soviets or us to monitor this new and most difficult element of non-fixed land-based systems.

People also claim strategic defense would be destabilizing—that is, if we have it, and they don't, tensions will increase. But such a claim ignores what the Soviets are doing already. Today, they have exploited fully the ABM treaty. With their recently exposed Krasnoyarsk large phased-array radar, they almost certainly have violated the ABM treaty. Yet, we have no ABM system. Similarly, they have a massive civil defense program. Yet, we have little in the area of civil defense. They have never abandoned defense of their homeland. Yet, we have almost abandoned nuclear defense of our homeland to a country that is outspending us about 20-to-1 in the area of strategic defense. Why shouldn't Americans and their allies also enjoy the advantages of defense? In fact, it is interesting to note that in recent polls the majority of Americans thought we already had a defensive system in place.

Finally, one of the most unfortunate criticisms of strategic defense is that it is just plain impossible. But, as a military person and close witness to U.S. ingenuity, I am especially careful about saying anything is impossible. After all, most of the tools of national defense we use without second thought today—from jet aircraft to nuclear-powered submarines—were the "impossible weapons" of yesterday. Yesterday's impossibilities are today's realities. We have proven our technological know-how time and again. Why should we doubt ourselves now? Limit our horizon and vision of tomorrow?

So, what requirements must a strategic defense system possess? First, a defensive system must be highly survivable. If so, then an attacker will believe he could not destroy our strategic defense systems while his own capabilities remained intact, and hence will not be tempted to attack. Second, if it can be made more expensive for an attacker to add warheads than for a defender to increase defense capability (and we think it can . . .), incentive to proliferate will decrease and stability and deterrence will be enhanced at reduced offensive levels.

The only way to determine if these requirements can be achieved is not through articles based on old data and sensationalized press releases, but through a concerted program of research and evaluation. We are now at the threshold of such a lengthy research effort. This is not to suggest our new direction—studying the implications of strategic defense—would demand any early or radical changes in current arms control policy. In fact, the strategic defense initiative has been designed specifically, and is being managed carefully, to be consistent with existing arms control obligations as transition to defense is sought.

What we desire is mutual recognition, by ourselves and the Soviets, that, despite our differing social systems and strategic doctrines, we have a common interest in peace and stability.

This common interest may seem self-evident to all mankind. Unfortunately, it is not, as interpretations of the words vary markedly. For those of you wishing to understand the Soviets better, I commend to you the recent Foreign Affairs article entitled "Living with the Soviets" by Paul Nitze . . . a man who has been a perceptive observer of world affairs and Soviet policy since I was a teenager.

Nitze points out that we and the Soviets mean different things when we say "peace." For us, peace is the absence of war and relaxation of trensions. For the Soviets, in contrast, peace implies a movement to the condition when world-wide victory of socialism has made war obsolete. It is, thus for them a term for a process of struggle and challenge.

This difference lies at the heart of many Soviet-American misunderstandings. It explains why "peaceful coexistence"—which sounds so attractive to us—means to the Soviets simply another form of the permanent struggle between two ways of life. These very different concepts of peace and stability make dealing with the Soviets a challenging task. Ultimately, however, we hope the Soviets will recognize the value of what Paul Nitze calls a "live and let live" policy. We hope they will understand that the Western concept of peace and stability are in their interests as well as ours. We hope they will join with us in devising arrangements which will ease transition to a more stable world in which defense plays a central role.

We live in dangerous times. Solutions of the past have not brought perfect safety, nor will solutions of the future. At this time, we have made no irrevocable decisions, nor should we. We have violated no treaties, nor will we. But given the benefits of strategic defense, it is our obligation to conduct research that will allow sound future decisions. Then, and only then, can we make a final decision about the utility of defensive systems in putting teeth in deterrence.

There is a poem of Robert Frost's which I believe is particularly appropriate at this moment in our history:

"I shall be telling this with a sigh . . .
Somewhere ages and ages hence:
Two roads diverged in a wood, and I—
I took the one less traveled by,
And that has made all the difference."

Well, now is our chance to swing toward the new road of hope. Now is the time to commit ourselves to be strong enough to bring about a better world order; to be bold enough to seek a better and more hopeful tomorrow; to be willing to speak with action and deed and not just with worn-out words of good intention. The choice of which diverging road to pick is solely ours . . . and the world watches.

As Robert Frost once noted, the road "less traveled by" can make all the difference. Who knows, but were we to lead ourselves and others toward it, we might find mankind's only hope to rid itself of the ominous spectre of self-destruction. Isn't it worth a try? So, I say . . . "America, let's go for it!"●

IRS VEHICLE LOG REGULATIONS

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, last session, in an effort to improve compliance for those individuals who combine business and personal use of their vehicles, Congress tightened the requirements for recordkeeping. We added the word "contemporaneous" to the Tax Code to ensure that better records would be kept. However, the IRS has issued regulations that have distorted the intent of Congress and have outraged the American public.

Alaskans have flooded our offices asking that this provision be repealed. I am sure many of my colleagues have received letters and phone calls from residents of their States that echo the sentiments of the residents of Alaska. As an outraged insurance broker wrote to me:

These changes are unnecessary harassment of business and individual taxpayers. It is another step by the IRS to make crooks out of all law abiding taxpayers.

The IRS requirements apply not just to business cars, but to delivery vehicles and heavy construction machinery as well. This means that the time and attention of business persons will now be devoted to the unproductive filling out of vehicle logs, rather than in making their businesses more productive. Small and large businesses cannot afford the extra burden of keeping such logs for the IRS.

Rather than dealing with those few persons who take advantage of our tax laws, the IRS has issued regulations that punish all businesses by requiring reams of paperwork. A truck loaded with tools and machinery, and covered with dust and dirt from a construction job can hardly be called a pleasure or personal vehicle. Yet the IRS requires a detailed log of all trips taken in that vehicle, at the time those trips are made. This makes no sense at a time in our history when we are trying to encourage our business people to increase productivity and efficiency so that our economy can continue to expand.

No one benefits by what the IRS has done. Until our tax laws are changed, it will continue to be lawful for persons to take deductions for using vehicles for business purposes. The IRS regulations, however, could have the effect of repealing this lawful deduction by requiring onerous paperkeeping burdens.

I am proud to be a cosponsor of Senator ABDNOR's bill, S. 245, that will require only reasonable records to support the business vehicle deductions.●

THE 44TH ANNUAL SCIENCE TALENT SEARCH FOR THE WESTINGHOUSE SCIENCE SCHOLARSHIPS AND AWARDS 1985

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, on January 16, 1985, the science talent search for the Westinghouse Science Scholarship and Awards 1985 Honors Group was announced. Each year, high school seniors holding great promise in science and engineering are singled out for the praise and recognition which they so richly deserve. This is always a time of great pride for New York State because of the many outstanding New Yorkers who win. And this year was no exception—133 young New Yorkers were selected for the Honors Group. In fact, no other State can call so many honorees their own. And this reflects something that those of us in New York have long known. Our children are the smartest in the Nation.

And if more proof is needed, it may be found in the list of 40 winners of this fine talent search. Of these 40 winners of a trip to Washington and the opportunity to win a 4-year Westinghouse science scholarship, 12 are New Yorkers. They are: Louis Craig Paul of Baldwin, Kristi Ann Dell of East Patchogue, Michael Steven Graziano of Buffalo, Leonard Tze-Yung Lee of Liverpool, Boris Y. Gelfand of New York, John Shu-Shin Kuo of Whitestone, Paul Chan of New York, Michael Friedman of Brooklyn, Junjiro Horiuchi of New York, Audrey Zelico of Forest Hills, Pasi Antero Janne of New York, and Huw Michael Nash of Webster.

I should simply wish to congratulate the New Yorkers who are counted in the 1985 Honors Group, and especially the 12 Washington trip winners. They have all made us proud. Indeed, so proud that I would like to share their accomplishment with my colleagues.

Mr. President, I ask that a list of New York Honors Group members and their projects be printed in the RECORD at this point.

PRESQUE ISLE PRESERVATION PROJECT

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague, ARLEN SPECTER, in introducing a measure that would authorize the implementation of a project for the control of beach erosion at Presque Isle Peninsula in Erie, PA.

Presque Isle State Park, one of the most beautiful public recreation areas in the Nation, attracts over 4 million visitors a year and is a bulwark of the regional economy. As you may have guessed, Mr. President, there is a direct link between the quality of Presque Isle State Park and the well being of the citizens of Erie. A stable and attractive Presque Isle Peninsula means a more healthy and vibrant northeast Pennsylvania.

Unfortunately, Presque Isle Peninsula has deteriorated in recent years under the incessant pounding of the waves of Lake Erie. As greater and greater portions of the Presque Isle shoreline are eroded, so, too, is the economic strength of the region it serves. The legislation introduced today is designed to halt the erosion of the Presque Isle shoreline and to preserve the peninsula for the enjoyment and economic benefit of future generations.

The beach preservation project this legislation would authorize is not a new one. The Army Corps of Engineers has thoroughly studied Presque Isle's problems, and the Congress has already appropriated $1.1 million for planning and design of a solution recommended by the corps. Beach preservation experiments conducted by the Corps of Engineers have shown that the construction of a series of offshore breakwalls parallel to the peninsula shoreline is the best way to halt further beach erosion at Presque Isle. Given the amount of time, energy, and resources already spent on this matter, it is clear that the corps' breakwall proposal is ripe for construction.

Mr. President, Senator SPECTER and I have worked hard over the past several years to arrive at a permanent solution to the problems which plague Presque Isle Peninsula. The foundations for such a solution have been carefully laid over the course of many months of in-depth research, planning, and design. Confident in the knowledge that further erosion at Presque Isle can be prevented, we have introduced this legislation in the hope that the final chapter of the Presque Isle preservation project will soon be written.●

IN TRIBUTE TO REPRESENTATIVE ALDO FREDA

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, it is always a sad moment in our lives when we hear news of the passing of someone we knew, particularly of a friend. Last Sunday, Aldo Freda, long-time State representative from the Federal Hill district of Providence, RI, passed away peaceably in his sleep. He leaves behind a legacy of dedicated service to his constituents, and caring and concern for his neighbors that went beyond his duties as a legislator.

As senior member of the Rhode Island State House of Representatives, Aldo Freda was respected as its dean. A hardworking legislator and chairman of the powerful House Corporations Committee, Aldo displayed a firm and even hand in wielding the gavel of its chairmanship. Blessed with a skill of oratory, Aldo instinctively knew the time to use a powerful voice or a gentle quip.

His annual Christmas parties and summer picnics, given for present and past residents of his district, were renowned for their record crowds. It was understood that you had to attend Aldo's functions not because of the large number of attendees, but failure to appear would incur a no-nonsense lecture by Aldo. The purpose of this sermon was to let you know that you had missed an opportunity, not just to greet voters, but to bring a little cheer and goodwill to those less fortunate.

I well remember back in early 1960 when we both first ran for office. Aldo was one of those who accompanied me down the main avenues and the back streets of his dearly loved Federal Hill. And now when I take my constituent walks through Federal Hill, I know there will be something missing—Aldo's compassion, dedication, and love.

I would like to express my deepest condolences to Aldo Freda's brothers and sisters and to his colleagues in the Rhode Island House of Representatives.

Mr. President, I ask that an editorial entitled "Aldo Freda, a conscientious legislator," from the Providence Journal, and an article by M. Charles Bakst of the Providence Journal be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The material follows:

[From the Providence Journal, Jan. 29, 1985]

FREDA DEVOTED HIS CAREER TO SERVING CONSTITUENTS

(By M. Charles Bakst)

I used to see him all the time at Angelo's, the unadorned, hearty restaurant that was one of his hangouts on Federal Hill, the House district he had represented since 1961.

It became a routine, and I started asking him, "Are you the official greeter here?" and he had to laugh.

I liked dealing with him at the State House because when I asked him a question, he would give me an answer. You'd be surprised how rare that is in politics.

His name was Aldo Freda. He was the dean of the House. He was a power of sorts—he was, after all, chairman of the House Corporations Committee—but when the 63-year-old bachelor died in his sleep on Sunday, and when political types remembered him yesterday, power was the last thing they mentioned.

He was by far the most senior member of the General Assembly. No one else even came close; these days politicians are too impatient to stay. Ambition or despair eventually get to them.

But Lt. Gov. Richard A. Licht said yesterday of Freda's House service: "This was his life. He never had a touch of superiority. He never had any airs about him. You know how some of us get when we're up here. We have a vision of our self-importance. He never did."

John Orabona, the Federal Hill senator who called Freda his mentor, said Freda was so busy serving constituents—"He was a layman priest"—he did not worry about elections. Often, in fact, he did not have an opponent.

"He said, 'John, I never have signs, I never have bumper stickers. I campaign 24 hours a day, 365 days a year.' The work was his campaigning."

Freda was a cutter of red tape, a helper, said former Democratic state chairman Charles T. Reilly, who compared his service to such as that offered by Action Line in the Journal-Bulletin or the Governor's Citizens Information Service.

"People of his era," said Frank Caprio, a former Federal Hill councilman, "were very close family and community-oriented people. When someone was sick or someone was in need of help, the community provided for them. It was the era of five- and six-tenement houses. He carried this philosophy from his personal life into his public life, and we don't have that kind of community closeness today."

Caprio and Orabona recalled Freda's self-appointed task, which stretched for years, of giving Ann Ortoleva a ride to work, or making sure someone else would do it that day. Mrs. Ortoleva, the widow of a former House colleague, was confined to a wheelchair and worked as a receptionist in the office of the attorney general.

Orabona remembered a time he and Freda went to see a woman on DePasquale Avenue: "This woman was without a stove and Aldo Freda went to a furniture store and he purchased a stove out of his own pocket for the woman."

And the time Freda went into Adolf Gianquitti's meat market, bought a bunch of turkeys and other products, and asked Gianquitti to disburse them to people in the neighborhood. "His wealth," said Orabona, "was the people in his district."

Just the other day, House Majority Leader Joseph DeAngelis said, Freda was working with Speaker Matthew J. Smith on behalf of a constituent who was about to enter the General Hospital and needed a special kind of bed.

In House debates, Freda had a booming vocie, but he really was a quiet man who did not seek glory. Reilly, who as state chairman engaged him as an unpaid aide, said, "He never looked for a complement or even a thank-you."

Freda used to have parties—Christmas parties and summer outings—that drew thousands, Orabona said there would be an administration fee of $5 or so for the summer picnics in Bristol, but there would be no charge for the needy or elderly, and Freda would pay for the bus transportation. People would eat all day, there was fun and prizes, and the host wound up digging into his own pocket to pay all the bills.

As Freda had no airs about himself, he gave similar advice to other politicians, like Thomas R. DiLuglio, the shy guy who was running for lieutenant governor in 1976 and had to admit he didn't enjoy gladhanding. "Don't you ever be anything but yourself," Freda told him.

When DiLuglio's successor, Richard Licht, thought back about Freda yesterday, he remembered an extraordinary thoughtfulness, a man who knew about Italo-American functions everywhere and who would call and say, you've got to be at this event, and you've got to be at that event, and the events were real community events. You'd meet people who you'd never see at any other political festivities."

And, Licht said, Freda was a pro's pro: "He'd get you in and get you out, but you also had to have something to eat while you were there."

Perhaps Freda's closest House friend was Rep. Joseph Quattrucci of East Providence. Quattrucci said he and some of the other reps would kid Freda, who was an insurance company district office supervisor, about perhaps its being time to pack it in after all those years in the legislature. He said Freda would snarl, "Would you guys get off my back? What am I going to do—sit on my fanny and get fat?"

Quattrucci was one of the fellows Freda used to enjoy having a few beers with at Micheletti's Restaurant after a day's House session. Quattrucci said Freda often would be in a hurry to get out of the State House, but that last Friday it took Freda almost two hours to extricate himself after adjournment. One thing would come up and then another; Freda would seem ready to leave, then he'd remember one more phone call he'd have to make.

"There was," Quattrucci said about Friday, "always a little thing he had to finish, as if somebody upstairs said, 'Aldo, finish this day because you're not coming back.'"

[From the Providence Journal, Jan. 29, 1985]

ALDO FREDA, A CONSCIENTIOUS LEGISLATOR

If ever there was an Italian leprechaun, it was Aldo Freda. A small man in size, but one of substantial stature in the General Assembly for a quarter-century, he possessed both the shrewdness and puckish humor of that legendary Irish figure. Proud of his own heritage, he recognized the same sentiment in those of other ancestries—and enjoyed to the full the legislature's annual celebrations of its member's varied backgrounds.

But Representative Freda, while never missing a chance to extol the good qualities inbued by his own Federal Hill upbringing and lifelong residency, was much more than an ethnic politician. True, he never did lose touch with homebase. His annual Christmas Party and summer picnic for constituents always drew record crowds. However, when presiding as chairman over the powerful House Corporations Committee or when otherwise involved in legislative affairs, he was all business.

A bachelor, Mr. Freda daily went to work at dawn as an insurance firm's district office supervisor, so that by noon the rest of his day was clear for State House duties. This same highly disciplined approach characterized his Assembly performance. He was a conscientious legislator, whose commonsense attitude impressed his colleagues. He could argue passionately, and effectively on issues he considered important. But he also had the knack for an oratorical quip to ease tense debates.

Although Rhode Island's is a part-time legislature, Mr. Freda gave fulltime attention to his role there from his first election in 1960. The end of that tenure (the current Assembly's lengthiest) because of his death Sunday truly represents more than a loss to his own constituents. Legislators come and go, but in Representative Freda's passing at age 63, all Rhode Island has lost a good public servant.●

DEFICIT REDUCTION BEGINS

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I wanted to comment on a matter that is of extreme interest to all Senators and I think extremely important to the people of this country. There can be no doubt that the last election sent a couple of very important signals to those who are elected to represent the people of this country. One, they want economic prosperity, they want a bright future, they want a continuation of real economic growth each year, low inflation, and the lowest possible taxes. Without any question, that was the issue of the last campaign and the people spoke loud and clear. For that to continue, there is no doubt that the policymakers representing the people of this country must reduce the ominous deficits that hang as a cloud over the future prosperity of the next couple of generations.

A little thing happened today about which the Senate should know. The Committee on Environment and Public Works, under the able leadership of the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. STAFFORD], this morning was engaged in deliberations over what might be the first substantive bill to be reported out of the committee this year. It was nothing more than a highway bill that authorizes a level of funding which we should not have taken much time with, but which was stalemated last year because any time you have a vehicle like that everybody uses it to add something. So we did not get it done last year. Maybe it was kind of providential that we did not because this morning the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee met to report out an authorization with reference to highway funding out of the trust fund. I am here to tell the Senate that that committee not only authorized a clean bill, without all of the demonstration programs that have become so historic and tap the validity of the highway trust fund and its purposes, but in addition to that did something extremely important with great symbolism.

Not only did they say, "Let us do that," but in addition they said, "Let us go beyond a freeze in terms of the money we are going to authorize. Let us cut $500 million beyond a freeze to send a signal that we as a committee, even in a trust fund program, one wherein we are collecting taxes and putting them into a fund—although that fund is in jeopardy in years to come—can cut a program although it surely has authority to spend more. Under the unified budget, if you spend less, you have a direct impact on the deficit. The Senate should know that the Environment and Public Works Committee reduced expected highway expenditures for the year 1986 by that little act by $1.7 billion.

I think that bodes well. That action was prompted on motion and amendment by the distinguished chairman of the Republican Conference, Senator CHAFEE, the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island. But I must say that it was bipartisan, for that amendment was cosponsored by the ranking Democrat, the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN].

After a vote on a freeze, which lost, the measure was passed by a vote of 14 to 1. That means it had tremendous bipartisan support. I hope everyone takes note of that, because I think we will have scores of opportunities in the next couple of months; and if each committee acts as this one did and says, "We won't wait around for the other; we won't say that we will not do it unless somebody else does; we will do our share," I think we will have a real chance this year to put together a reduction of $50 billion or more in the deficits for 1986 in a meaningful way.

While to some this all sounds like numbers and to others it may sound like the same old record, to many of us it is the most significant kind of policy decision we can make.

While it might be more attractive to come to the floor week after week on substantive measures and new ideas and innovative proposals, we are clearly at a stage of economic prosperity in this country that demands nothing less than this committee did today.

I extend my commendations to the distinguished chairman, as I have indicated, and to the ranking minority member, who joined in this, and to the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHAFEE], who proposed it.

I find nothing but a high sense of responsibility, and I am proud to have been there to vote on it. There should be no doubt how I voted. I voted for a half-billion dollars less than the freeze amount on that authority, and I will do my share from this day on, and I hope many will join.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, while we await word from the minority leader, let me say that I am pleased to be a member of the Committee on Environment and Public Works. Indeed, this morning's action, by a vote of 14 to 1 on a tough budget issue, on a very popular type of program, is exactly what we will find ourselves doing in the next weeks.

I very much admire the effort of Senator CHAFEE and Senator BENTSEN as they prepared that amendment, and obviously they presented it very ably. My proxy was cast in favor of it. I was participating in the Edwin Meese confirmation hearing.

What Senator DOMENICI has said is something we will all be heeding very carefully in these next weeks, because he, as chairman of the Budget Committee, is a very certain trumpet in this area; and many of us will be heeding his views as we work with him and with Senator CHILES, the ranking minority member of the Budget Committee.

The House met at 11 a.m.

Rev. Malaki Tauiliili, American Samoan Christian Congregational Church, Carson, CA, offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, Ruler of Nations. You have been our helper in ages past. Our hope for years to come, of whom all rulers and authorities in the world pray for guidance to lead our Government.

At the opening of a new session of Congress, I pray You will take into Your gracious care all Members of the Senate and of all the House of Representatives, the presiding officers, and all other officials. Endow them with a high sense of responsibilities of the office to which they have been elected. THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

REV. MALAKI TAUILIILI

(Mr. SUNIA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. SUNIA. Mr. Speaker, our guest chaplain today is Elder Pastor Malaki Tauiliili of the Christian Congregational Church of American Samoa. His church is in the South Bay area of the city of Los Angeles.

In recent years, more and more Samoans from our South Sea territory have come to California and elsewhere on the west coast looking for education and employment. Many now live there permanently. Today, five times as many Samoans live in California as they do back home. Fifteen percent of my voters live there.

Reverend Tauiliili was trained for the ministry at Malua Theological College. Following his graduation, he joined the U.S. Navy and served for 20 years. Upon his retirement in 1977, he returned to the ministry. His South Bay church has a membership of 800 Samoans.

I join you, Mr. Speaker, in welcoming Reverend Tauiliili to the Capital and to express joy at his being our guest chaplain today.

INCREASE IN SIZE OF PERMANENT SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 33) to amend rule XLVIII of the rules of the House to increase the size of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 33

Resolved, That clause 1(a) of Rule XLVIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by striking out "fourteen" and inserting "not more than sixteen" in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, this is a simple change of rule XLVIII to allow the membership of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence to be increased from 14 to 16. It is my understanding that this increase has been agreed to by the majority and the minority leaderships.

The SPEAKER. Does the minority desire time?

Mr. MICHEL. No, Mr. Speaker.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ELECTION OF CERTAIN MAJORITY MEMBERS TO VARIOUS STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Democratic caucus and by direction of the caucus, I call up a privileged resolution (H. Res. 34) and ask for its immediate consideration.

SELECTED RESERVE MANPOWER INITIATIVE

(Mr. MONTGOMERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, on Monday I announced a series of initiatives which I have developed to improve the readiness of our Guard and Reserve Forces and, at the same time, reduce the overall defense budget. Today, I wish to speak on the first of these initiatives, the selected reserve manpower initiative.

I plan three actions to ensure that the Selected Reserve manpower requirements continue to be met. First, I have requested a review by the House Armed Services Committee of the total package of recruiting and retention incentives now available to the Reserve Forces. Such a review will help ensure that our defense dollars are spent in the most cost-effective manner.

Second, I will introduce legislation which will provide the incentives necessary to attract and retain physicians and other health care professionals in the Selected Reserve. I view the shortages being experienced as critical.

Third, I will introduce a bill which, after date of its enactment, will allow those who enlist in the Selected Reserve to become eligible for the new peacetime GI bill benefits. This bill will also allow pursuit of an expanded program of education and make other technical corrections.

Mr. Speaker, I believe these three actions will produce a significant improvement in Reserve Force readiness. Greater reliance may then be placed upon these Reserve Forces which, in turn, will result in a smaller expenditure of taxpayer dollars.

DIESEL FUEL TAX REBATE

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to end the unfair penalty we levied against American diesel car owners when we passed the 1984 Deficit Reduction Act. Under DEFRA the diesel fuel tax was raised 6 cents per gallon. While this new tax was supposed to be targeted at large trucks to help offset the damage they cause on highways, we managed to stick it to the average American who owns a diesel-powered car or light truck.

This is the same person who bought the vehicle hoping to conserve fuel and got caught up in the OPEC price war several years ago.

He is also the person who has seen his vehicle drastically depreciated simply because it was a diesel and his trade-in value plummet when GM decided that they will no longer produce diesel engines for passenger cars.

Congress added to their plight by asking all diesel car owners to bear the full burden of paying for a road damage problem which cannot be attributed to their usage. All we are attempting to return to the diesel owner is the amount of additional tax he is forced to pay.

Every day we hear and read about fairness. Well today we can be fair, and correct the problem we created for diesel car owners. I urge my colleagues to support my bill to rebate the diesel fuel tax wrongfully imposed last year.

BILLS TO OPPOSE IMF LOANS TO SOUTH AFRICA AND TO PROHIBIT IMPORTATION OF KRUGERRANDS INTO THE UNITED STATES

(Mr. MITCHELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, because of the despicable conditions of inhumanity that exist in the Republic of South Africa, I am introducing legislation which will give the Members of the House an opportunity to go on record to indicate to South Africa and the world that the United States is willing to take action against the abominable system of racial discrimination. This bill directs the U.S. Director of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) to vote against providing any financial assistance to any country which practices apartheid.

Mr. Speaker, we have seen essentially no change in the status quo of apartheid in South Africa over the past two decades save the accelerated violence and oppression by Pretoria. We have heard witnesses before various committees in the House testify that loans made to the Government of South Africa from private sources and the IMF contribute directly to the perpetuation apartheid's desecration and rape of the black population's political and economic rights. The Government of South Africa borrowed an estimated $1.2 billion from the IMF in November 1982 and $3.7 billion from U.S. banks during that same year. The IMF itself cited the practice of apartheid as a threat to economic stability in South Africa and recommended an extensive restructuring of the abhorrent social system in a report issued on May 19, 1983 by an IMF economic team. Thus the practice of racial segregation is not only morally unsound, but economically fallacious as well.

For these reasons, I believe this bill deserves the support of all Members who are sincere in their opposition to the violence, human suffering and economic exploitation which results from minority rule in South Africa, and I encourage my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring and working for the enactment of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives has adopted in the past, several resolutions sharply criticizing the pernicious institutionalized racist policies of the South African Government. While I have supported many of these measures which enunciate the sense of the House that the Republic of South Africa should cease its "constitutional" practice of apartheid, I believe it is long overdue that we convert our rhetoric into action. It is in this spirit that I am introducing legislation to prohibit the importation into the United States or its territories of the South African krugerrand or any other gold coins minted in South Africa or offered for sale by the Government of South Africa.

Because of the complexity of apartheid with all its interlocking components, all loans and investments to any part of the system benefits the system as a whole, and thus provides the South African Government with income to help maintain the suppression of black South Africans. Not only do the blacks of South Africa receive no benefit from krugerrand sales, but the gold used in the krugerrand is the product of the mining industry which exploits black labor, and exposes them to appalling and dangerous conditions.

While it impossible to determine what level of funds invested by the United States in the krugerrand are funneled directly into the maintenance of apartheid, it is certain that the only way to prevent U.S. contribution to it is by restricting U.S. purchases of gold coins offered for sale by the Government of South Africa.

I would like to encourage my colleagues to give careful consideration to all bills which make clear our opposition to South Africa's apartheid system, and to join with me in cosponsoring this legislation which is a part of that effort.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

The bill would bar the importation into the United States or its territories of the krugerrand or any other gold coin minted in South Africa or offered for sale by the Government of South Africa.

Violation of this section of the bill would result in a fine of up to $1 million for any entity other than an individual, and not more than five times the value of the krugerrands or gold coins involved for an individual. Any authorized person or agent who knowingly carries out or acquiesces in the practice constituting the violation shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

FRAUDULENT ROLLBACK OF ODOMETER MILEAGE FIGURES

(Mr. TAUKE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, one of the major forms of consumer fraud plaguing Americans today is the rollback of odometer mileage figures on used cars and trucks sold around the Nation. It is estimated that over 3 million used vehicles sold each year have had their odometers rolled back. This deception is costing the American consumer dearly—the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration estimates that the cost of odometer tampering to consumers exceeds over $2 billion a year.

In Iowa alone a year-long crackdown has netted more than 800 cars with altered mileage figures. These cars had over 21 million miles illegally erased from their odometers, costing Iowa consumers over $5 million. Although Iowa has had considerable success in combating this fraud, State transportation officials say that they are hampered by the difficulty of tracing a vehicle's history. Some altered odometers found in Iowa were traced through the paperwork of eight States.

In an effort to stem this rising tide of consumer fraud, I join my colleague from Texas [Mr. BRYANT] in introducing legislation today to give added punch to State and Federal enforcement efforts. The legislation we are offering would:

Require odometer readings to be printed on vehicle registrations and titles;

Require auto auction companies to retain mileage and vehicle identification numbers for 4 years after a car is sold, the same length of time required of auto dealers; and

Increase the maximum prison penalty for odometer tampering from 1 year to 3 years, and raise the maximum fine from $1,000 to $2,000.

I believe that the adoption of these provisions will make odometer tampering less attractive to criminals and will better protect American consumers. The price of odometer fraud is outrageous. And I call upon my colleagues to support this necessary legislation.

TAXPAYERS' BILL OF RIGHTS

(Mr. REID asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, during the 98th Congress two of the most frequently repeated themes before this body were deficit reduction and tax reform. When we spoke of tax reform, our general focus was on ways we could make the system more equitable for the taxpayer.

Because "equity" comes in many forms, including the oversight of Internal Revenue Service abuses of taxpayers, I have today introduced the taxpayer bill of rights.

This legislation addresses such problem areas as: Questionable tax enforcement practices, disclosure of rights and obligations of taxpayers, the awarding of costs to prevailing taxpayers, procedures involving taxpayer interviews, provisions of an ombudsman, GAO oversight of the IRS, and an appeals process for adverse IRS decisions.

One of the most important provisions of my bill would prohibit performance evaluations of IRS personnel, based upon the amounts collected from taxpayers through audit and investigation.

I have sponsored this legislation because I strongly believe that by protecting taxpayers against tax collection abuses, we are taking an important step toward restoring taxpayer confidence in our Nation's tax system.

UNITED STATES IS FACING ITS GREATEST AGRICULTURAL CALAMITY

(Mr. MARLENEE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, the United States of America is facing the greatest agricultural calamity that has ever faced this Nation. It has already begun, and if allowed to continue will rip the seams of the fabric of this Nation apart.

The sad part of this story, Mr. Speaker, is that it is within the power of the legislative and administrative branches of this Government to develop the legislative tools that could be used to solve the problems, that could be used to increase exports of agricultural products, that could be used to make our products more competitive without taking it out of the hide of the producers.

Think of it, legislation that will help this Nation vastly reduce its deficit balance of trade by increasing agricultural exports.

I urge my colleagues to look closely at legislation that would develop export incentives similar to my Export Incentive Act.

It is time that we recognize we have to deal with world markets and world competition. It is time for us to get tough as an exporting nation.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION PRIME TARGET OF ADMINISTRATIVE HATCHET

(Mrs. SCHROEDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, next week the President will submit his budget to Congress. One area in which deep cuts are likely is in the Federal field structure. To buy more and more expensive weapon systems, we are going to be asked to gut Government services to the people.

The Veterans' Administration is a prime target of this hatchet. Currently, there are 57 VA field offices which provide important counseling services to veterans. A plan circulating within the administration calls for cutting these 57 offices down to 3 nationwide. And, the plans calls for firing nearly 2,000 VA employees who now provide needed services to veterans. So, the veterans go on the auction block to feed the Pentagon's insatiable appetite.

Wait, there's more. Various administration options call for the elimination of between 200 and 900 Social Security offices and the axing of 19,000 workers. The same volume of contested claims will have to be decided by substantially fewer claims examiners. So, our senior citizens and our disabled citizens will be short changed to fund the Pentagon's addiction.

And, the administration is planning a wholesale abolition of regional offices of all agencies. So what if citizens have to come to Washington to deal with housing loans, agricultural payments, Federal jobs, or Government contracts, the administration thinks. If taxpayers are angry about the amount of Government services they get for their tax dollars, they will be furious when they find out that they have to cross the Potomac to deal with Government agencies.

I urge the administration to back off this plan to decimate Government services to satisfy Weinberger's appetite. Let's cut spending to reduce the deficit. But let's do it fairly and intelligently.

SAN GABRIEL VALLEY TRIBUNE AND WHITTIER DAILY NEWS EDUCATING READERS ON WORK OF GRACE COMMISSION

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, the great Virginia patriot George Mason once said:

> The freedom of the press is one of the greatest bulwarks of liberty, and can never be restrained.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I am proud to report the unrestrained role two newspapers in my district are playing in educating their readers about the work of the Grace Commission. Responding to front-page appeals in the San Gabriel Valley Tribune and Whittier Daily News, nearly 3,000 readers sent in petitions in support of the Grace Commission during the first 10 days of 1985 alone. Thanks to the Tribune/Daily News, the Commission's recommendations have been discussed in community groups, high school classrooms, and above all, by private citizens. Many have written to me, asking why Congress hasn't acted on the Grace proposals.

Last year, Members of this body tried to shelve the Commission's recommendations for reducing Federal spending in the hope that they would soon be forgotten; but if newspapers from around the country follow the example of the Tribune/Daily News and tell the American people about the Grace Commission recommendations and its blue print for reducing Federal spending, this body may someday have a full and free debate on the Grace report.

President Reagan said it best in his inaugural address when he defined the task ahead of us this year by saying: "If not us—who; and if not now—when?" The time to reduce the deficit is now. The place to begin is the report of the Grace Commission.

THE TAXPAYER RELIEF ACT

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the many Congressmen and Congresswomen who have helped with H.R. 600 in the past several weeks, I want to thank the more than 100 Members of Congress who have cosponsored our bill.

H.R. 600 repeals the controversial provision in the Tax Code which calls for a contemporaneous accounting for legitimate business deductions on the part of farmers, contractors, salesmen, and small businessmen and businesswomen.

All of us should pay our legitimate taxes but the IRS has gone too far in their bureaucratic approach to contemporaneous accounting. Frankly, the cure is worse than the disease.

The revisions proposed last week by the IRS improved their position but are still far to burdensome and unfair.

I assure the Congress that we plan to continue to push for complete repeal of this provision. Join with us; cosponsor H.R. 600, the Taxpayer Relief Act. We need you now.

BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

(Mr. STRANG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Speaker, 198 years ago today, Thomas Jefferson wrote in a letter to James Madison, "A little rebellion now and then is a good thing." Such a rebellion is now upon us; spearheaded by a grassroots evolution of concerns from individual citizens, working through their State legislatures. That rebellion's cry is a plea to the Federal legislature to get its economic house in order by adopting a balanced budget amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The rebels are saying to us, "If you don't, we will," and their means will be a constitutional convention.

These citizens, and I count myself among them, have as the foundation of their rallying cry, a document nurtured and perfected by another group of revolutionaries during the first Constitutional Convention in 1787—article V of our Constitution. James Madison, perceived by many as the Father of the Constitution, wrote in the Federalist Papers regarding article V, the method prescribed for the several States to call a constitutional convention:

> The mode preferred by the Convention [in 1787] seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable; and that extreme difficulty which perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the general and state governments to originate the amendments of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other.

Thus, it is only proper that if the Congress fails to act, given an overwhelming outcry by the public at large, then the several States will act to do our work for us. I don't want that to happen. I believe that responsibility rests with those of us in this Chamber and with our colleagues in the other body. If there are those in Congress who face the prospect and outcome of an article V constitutional convention with some trepidation, then they should heed the warning calls from people across this Nation who want and expect the Federal Government to maintain a balance of receipts and expenditures, without raising taxes.

Thomas Jefferson warned that "the public debt is the greatest of dangers to be feared by a Republican Government," and he proposed the concept of a balanced budget amendment as early as 1789. "I wish it were possible to obtain a single amendment to our Constitution," Jefferson wrote:

> I would be willing to depend on that alone for the reduction of the administration of our government to the genuine principles of its Constitution; I mean an additional Article, taking from the federal government the power of borrowing.

Alexander Hamilton strongly urged the repayment of the national debt. Presidents John Adams, James Madison, James Monroe, John Quincy Adams, and Andrew Jackson all urged avoiding public debt. A balanced budget was synonymous with sound political economy among our Founding Fathers. Over these many years we have lost sight of their vision.

The balanced budget amendment to the Constitution I am introducing today is, if you will, Jeffersonian in its simplicity. Some will say too simple because it does not deal with all the complexities of the issue. Perhaps there is some merit in that, and I am willing and eager to lead and participate in a full discussion of the particulars.

This proposed amendment is straightforward; that is how I believe Jefferson would have wanted it. This amendment does not make provisions for tax increases. That is of major importance to me, and I hope to many of my colleagues as well. This amendment provides a waiver only in time of war or national emergency, as declared by Congress, and then only when adopted by a two-thirds vote of the Congress. The language provides a period of at least 2 years after ratification to prepare for its implementation.

Our distinguished late colleague GILLIS LONG of Louisiana once urged his party members to show "their compassion to care, but also the toughness to govern." We need this constitutional restraint, partly because our Federal legislature has shown much compassion, but too little toughness. The fact now is, congressional spending is hemorrhaging in a pool of red ink. There is a clear and present danger of economic suicide.

We need this constitutional restraint, because we have proven a simple law will not suffice. It is a fact that no single Congress can bind a succeeding Congress by statute. A balanced budget statute, or law limiting taxes can be and has been waived by adoption of a new law or a new budget which takes precedence over previous statutes. The Byrd-Grassley amendment to the IMF loan program was the law of the land and required that in fiscal year 1981, total budget outlays of the Federal Government "shall not" exceed its receipts (Public Law 95-435). In 1979, a provision in a law to increase the national debt limit stated that "Congress shall balance the Federal budget" (Public Law 96-5), which required the congressional budget committees to propose balanced budgets for fiscal year 1981 and subsequent years. The fact is these statutory efforts had no effect, for in fiscal year 1981 there was a $50 billion deficit.

We need this constitutional restraint to bring reality to the political process and to our bias to spend. The collective need to control spending has thus far proved no match for the pressures each individual Member faces to increase spending. The fact is, the movement over the past 50 years has been toward bigger Government and economic instability. This movement results from decisions of reasonable men and women in Congress, who, as individuals, find it more and more difficult to resist the pressures, especially in an election year, to increase spending.

We need this constitutional restraint, because our plastic voting card has, in fact, become a plastic credit card. Unlike our commercial credit cards, this one has no limit. We are not financing this debt out of our own pockets, rather we are mortgaging the financial futures of our children and grandchildren. And no one, at least not yet, has sent us a letter to tell us our credit limit is frozen until we start repaying this debt. No, ours is an unlimited credit line. To finance it, we will just borrow more; print more money, or raise taxes. It's a plan for financial disaster.

Thirty-two State legislatures have acted under article V of the Constitution. Action by only two more States is required to total the two-thirds necessary to force a constitutional convention. While I appreciate the provisions of article V, it is my firm belief that the responsibility for balancing the Federal budget lies and must lie within this institution. We should not have to be forced into resolving this issue. We have only to muster the courage to act, because it is simply the right and responsible action to take.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, and especially the members of the Judiciary Committee, to listen and hear the groundswell of public pleadings, and to act in a forthright and responsible manner to begin the process of hearings and action on these proposals to add to our Constitution, article 27—to require a balanced Federal budget.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL TO MAKE THE SOCIAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATION AN INDEPENDENT AGENCY

(Mr. PICKLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing jointly with Representative BILL ARCHER, who serves with me as the ranking Republican on the Social Security Subcommittee, legislation which will establish the Social Security Administration as an independent agency, removing it from the Department of Health and Human Services. I believe this administrative reorganization is necessary if we are to have a stable and secure system of Social Security.

All of us must admit that our Social Security program will never meet its objectives unless the public is confident that promised benefits will be paid. The public does not have that trust today—at least it is doubtful, particularly by our younger workers.

In the past, people feared they would not get their benefits because the trust funds were inadequate. However, passage of the Social Security Amendments of 1983 resolved most of these financial concerns. For the past 2 years, the trustees' reports show the system is in financial balance.

Nevertheless, the public still has doubts that the system will work for them because deep down they doubt that the "politicians" have the will to let the system work.

The public is continually bombarded with claims by public and private leaders that Social Security must be changed for one reason or another. At the same time, the public sees clearly the decline in the quality of service resulting from hiring freezes which are imposed by the OPM, regardless of SSA's needs. People know all too well the frustration and inconvenience caused by equipment and building location decisions made to satisfy the GSA but not the public. They become doubters when they see financial projections are being made by the Office of Management and Budget to satisfy whatever economic policy is currently in fashion, and not to protect those who have paid into the system for a lifetime. And they are dismayed by the confusion and turmoil caused by the constant change in SSA Commissioners due to capricious administrative meddling and manipulation.

Americans are willing to make sacrifices to ensure a measure of financial security when they can no longer work. But in return they must have some certainty that the commitment of a lifetime will not be swept away in some passing political crisis of the moment.

We can and should respond to this valid public concern by giving the Social Security Administration the long-term administrative stability which its unique mission requires.

I believe establishing the Social Security Administration as an independent agency will accomplish this purpose. I urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting this needed reform.

I am pleased to say that Representative DAN ROSTENKOWSKI, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and Representative EDWARD ROYBAL, chairman of the Select Committee on Aging, are also sponsoring this legislation.

SUMMARY OF PROVISIONS

A Bill to establish the Social Security Administration as an independent agency of the executive branch

1. Programs to be administered by the independent agency.

The independent agency would be charged with administration of the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance (OASDI) program and the supplemental security income (SSI) program.

2. Agency management.

The independent agency would be governed by a Social Security Board which would appoint a Commissioner of Social Security to act as chief operating officer of the agency responsible for administering the programs.

The Social Security Board would be composed of 3 members appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than 2 members could be of the same political party. Board members would serve staggered 6-year terms. The chairperson of the Board would be designated by the President. The Board would be responsible for prescribing such rules and regulations as it determines necessary to carry out the functions of the agency.

The Board would appoint a Commissioner to serve a term of 5 years. The Commissioner would be responsible for administering, in accordance with applicable statutes and regulations the OASDI and SSI programs and perform such functions as the Board may prescribe. The Board would also appoint a Deputy Commissioner to serve a 5-year term.

3. New agency offices.

New agency offices established under the bill include those of the General Counsel, Inspector General, and Beneficiary Ombudsman.

The General Counsel would be appointed by and serve at the pleasure of the Board. The Inspector General would be appointed in accordance with the Inspector General Act of 1978.

The Board would establish by regulation an Office of the Beneficiary Ombudsman, to be headed by a Beneficiary Ombudsman appointed by the Board for a 5-year term. The Beneficiary Ombudsman would be responsible for representing the interests of OASDI and SSI beneficiaries in the agency's decision-making process and assisting beneficiaries in resolving problems with the agency.

4. Personnel provisions.

The Board would have all the authority that may under current law be delegated by the Office of Personnel Management (OPM), including the authority to develop the agency's own recruitment and examination program for entry level employees, and job classifications and pay ranges for job categories identified by the Board as unique or critical to agency operations. In addition, the OPM would be required to authorize additional Senior Executive Service positions. The agency would also be authorized additional positions at levels IV and V of the Executive Schedule.

5. Other administrative authorities.

The Board would have all the authority that may under current law be delegated by the General Services Administration and that is necessary for acquiring, operating, and maintaining facilities needed for administering programs, and for leasing or purchasing automated data processing (ADP) equipment. The Board would also have authority to contract for ADP equipment or services.

6. Budget and appropriation provisions.

Budget requests would be submitted by the agency to the President. Appropriation requests for staffing would be based on comprehensive workforce plans based on dollar limitations rather than personnel ceiling controls. The agency would have contract authority for ADP procurement covering the total cost of such acquisitions. Amounts necessary for the liquidation of contract authority would be available from the trust funds so long as the Board, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, determined that such amounts were not necessary to meet current obligations for benefit payments.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on this legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the leaders of the Ways and Means Committee for bringing forward a good piece of legislation to create an independent, board-governed Social Security Agency. I am happy to join them in this effort and I am proud to have worked with them and their capable staff in drafting this legislation.

I am disappointed that I could not take the floor today because I had to attend a meeting at the White House on the budget. However I want my colleagues to know I support this legislation strongly.

I would also like to recognize the good work of my colleagues on the Aging Committee who joined with me last summer in introducing H.R. 5904 of the 98th Congress. Our bill along with Mr. PICKLE's previous legislation, H.R. 6178, were the forebearers of this new effort.

The original cosponsors of H.R. 5904, Ms. OAKAR, Mr. SYNAR, Mr. VENTO, Mr. FRANK, Mr. WISE, Mr. DYSON, and Mr. SEIBERLING, were very supportive in our early efforts to give Social Security employees better tools to do the job they want to do. I do not believe we would have come so far without their active support.

In addition, Senator DAVID PRYOR, primary sponsor of our legislation in the other body, has already reintroduced our legislation as S. 122. His support and that of other Senate leaders is a good indication that there is strong support on the other side of the Capitol.

Last summer, Mr. PICKLE held a hearing on whether the SSA should be made into an independent agency. If you read through the testimony I think you will be as impressed as I was by the level of agreement among Social Security experts and administrators for more independence for Social Security. Their unanimity should motivate the 99th Congress to move quickly to enact legislation to create an independent agency governed by a bipartisan board.

Mr. Speaker, I again congratulate Mr. PICKLE and wish him great speed.

Robert Flemminger, then president of the National Council of Social Security Managers Association, represented almost 4,000 managers in over 1,300 Social Security field offices. At the Ways and Means Subcommittee hearing, Mr. Flemminger chose this hearing on the independent agency to present his association's first ever testimony to a congressional committee. In his own words he said he came:

Because most of our current problems are a result of unstable cabinet level leadership and our being only one part of HHS. As a result, the National Council of Social Security Managers Association fully endorses an independent SSA along the lines proposed by H.R. 5904. A board of directors, a longer term-appointed Commissioner, and independent status could again make us a great agency.

Kenneth Blaylock, national president of the American Federation of Government Employees which represents 72,000 Social Security employees, agreed with the SSA Managers Association that:

The real difficulties in Social Security are management problems—poor administration of the disability programs, for example, or bad office conditions or outdated computers. Our own experience with management has taught us that here is an organizaton not in control of its programs, its own resources, or budget, or its own policy.

Robert Myers, the Reagan administration's former Deputy Commissioner of Social Security and the Executive Director of the 1983 National Commission on Social Security Reform, testified that the layered organizational structure which includes HHS and OMB has the result that:

Necessary and desirable action is often delayed so long as to be useless. An outstanding example of this is the infamous notch situation in the OASDI program which could have been directly alleviated by a feasible legislative change in 1981—or even earlier, but never surfaced from the layers of review.

Mr. Myers reasserted his long standing recommendation that SSA should be an independent agency governed by a full-time board appointed on a bipartisan basis.

Wilbur Cohen, Secretary of HEW during the Johnson administration, testified on behalf of the Save Our Security Coalition and stressed the necessity of creating a board-governed organizational structure. His testimony was endorsed by Arthur Flemming, Secretary of HEW during the Eisenhower administration; Robert Ball, Commissioner of SSA in the Kennedy, Johnson, and Nixon administrations; Nelson Cruikshank, Special Assistant to the President on Aging in the Carter administration; and William Bechill, Commissioner on Aging in the Johnson administration. They favor an independent board-governed agency, in part, because it would help to restore public and congressional confidence in the program.

Furthermore, the Save Our Security Coalition stated:

If there had been a board administering the disability provision of the Social Security program in 1981, we would not have had the unfortunate recent experience with the administration of the disability program. With a bipartisan board, there very likely would have been a whistle blower on the Board who would have revealed or moderated the precipitate and uncompassionate implementation of the 1980 amendments.

The legislation introduced by myself, the gentleman from Illinois and the two gentlemen from Texas will insulate the administration of Social Security from the arbitrary pressures too often seen over the last decade.

The board-governed organizational structure proposed by this legislation is endorsed by the SSA Managers' Association, SSA Employees' Union, former Secretaries of HEW and Commissioners of SSA and the beneficiaries represented by the Save Our Security Coalition. As an original cosponsor, I ask my colleagues to join with me in supporting speedy movement of this bill through the legislative process.

I ask that a short outline of the major provisions of the bill be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

PROPOSED INDEPENDENT SOCIAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATION

(1) GENERAL STRUCTURE AND RESPONSIBILITY

Remove the Old Age, Survivors and Disability Insurance programs plus Supplemental Security Income from HHS and place them under a free standing Social Security Administration. (Leave Medicare/Medicaid, Refugee Resettlement, AFDC, Energy Assistance and Child Support Enforcement in HHS).

The agency is governed by a three member Board of Directors with staggered six year terms. The Board appoints a single Commissioner to a five year term. A public Ombudsman represents citizen concerns within the agency. An Inspector General assesses agency performance.

The management of the agency is strengthened by giving it greater flexibility and independence from GSA and OPM.

(2) THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Three members nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate for six year terms staggered so that one term expires at the end of each even numbered year. The Chairman is appointed by the President. Removal during term requires a finding of neglect of duty or malfeasance by the President which must be transmitted in writing to Congress in five days.

Responsibilities

(A) To govern the Administration through regulation.

(B) To appoint a Commissioner to be the Chief Operating Officer.

(C) To act as Trustees for the Social Security Trust Funds. Other Trustees are the Secretaries of the Treasury and HHS and two public members required by the 1983 Amendments.

(D) To make annual budgetary recommendations and defend such recommendations before the Congress.

(E) To provide analysis, information and recommendations to the Congress and the President on proposed changes in Social Security programs.

(F) To conduct policy analysis and research.

(3) THE COMMISSIONER

The Commissioner is appointed by the Board to a five year term. Removal during the term requires a majority vote of the Board.

Responsibilities

(A) To be the chief operating officer responsible for administering Social Security programs in a manner consistent with law and regulations.

(B) To establish and maintain an efficient and effective operational structure.

(C) To devise and implement long-run plans to improve the effectiveness and administration of these programs.

(D) To make the annual budgetary recommendations for ongoing administrative expenses and to defend such recommendations before the Board and the Congress.

(E) To advise the Board and the Congress of the administrative impact of legislative changes in Social Security programs.

(F) To act as Secretary to the Board of Trustees.

(G) To make an annual report to the Board for the Congress on the administrative endeavors and accomplishments of the Agency.

(4) THE DEPUTY COMMISSIONER

The Deputy Commissioner performs duties as delegated by the Commissioner and acts as Commissioner when the Commissioner is absent or incapacitated. The Deputy Commissioner's 5 year term coincides with the Commissioner's term.

(5) THE INSPECTOR GENERAL

An Inspector General, nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, is established pursuant to the Inspector General's Act of 1978 as amended.

(6) OTHER

The legislation includes a statement of a beneficiary's and contributor's "bill of rights."

The legislation incorporates provisions which strengthen the independent management of the Administration. These recommendations: (1) base SSA's personnel budget on a workforce plan rather than a personnel ceiling; (2) allow SSA greater authority for computer acquisition and property management; and (3) allow SSA greater flexibility in recruiting new employees and compensating senior executives.●

ALCOHOL ABUSE STUDY

(Mr. NIELSON of Utah asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, alcohol abuse has become a serious problem in this country today. It is at a crisis level and every year thousands of adults and young people become victims of tragic alcohol-related accidents. Not only does it cause death on the highways but it also destroys families. Battered wives and abused children are often the result.

There is a growing feeling in the country today that there is a direct relationship between alcohol abuse and beer and wine ads on television and radio. Celebrities and sports figures are often used to promote these products and these famous individuals may have a direct influence on the drinking habits of young people. However, as yet, no direct link has been scientifically established between these ads and excessive or illegal use of alcohol.

Today, I am introducing legislation that calls for a comprehensive study of the problem. The study would be conducted by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms with findings and determinations to be submitted by the Surgeon General as well as those made by other Federal agencies. An opportunity for public comment is provided. At the end of 1 year, a report would be made to Congress and recommendations for legislation or administrative action would be included.

A national movement is presently underway to completely ban ads or call for mandatory equal time for anti-alcohol ads. Before taking either of these drastic steps, let us take a close look at the problem. I advocate a scientific study to determine if action is necessary, and if so, which approach would be most productive. I ask for the support of my colleagues for this reasonable piece of legislation.

ODOMETER TAMPERING

(Mr. BRYANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, today, my colleague, Mr. TAUKE, and I are introducing legislation to help eliminate an extensive fraudulent practice which is costing American consumers billions of dollars: odometer tampering. Today's consumer in the market for a used car or truck is likely to pay between $750 and $1,000 more for the vehicle if it has been the target of an odometer rollback. A conservative estimate is that over 3 million cars are subject to this fraud and the average odometer rollback is 30,000 miles.

In the State of Texas alone, the Attorney General has filed 29 odometer tampering lawsuits in the last 2 years. This represents 15 percent of the consumer protection suits filed by that office since January 1983. Clearly, this is a serious problem which requires our prompt attention.

The legislation we are introducing will enable law enforcement officials and the general public to more readily detect and identify vehicles which have been subject to odometer tampering. Basically, the measure establishes a record of odometer readings, since each time a car is registered, the owner will have to include the current odometer reading with his registration application. Each time a vehicle is sold, the odometer reading will be required on the title.

I urge my colleagues to join us by cosponsoring and supporting this measure, thereby putting a stop to a rapidly growing and extremely lucrative fraud. We will be protecting consumers and saving them literally billions of dollars each year once this measure is signed into law.

APPOINTMENT AS MEMBERS OF PERMANENT SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE

Mr. HAMILTON of Indiana, chairman;

Mr. STOKES of Ohio;

Mr. McCURDY of Oklahoma;
Mr. BEILENSON of California;
Mr. KASTENMEIER of Wisconsin;
Mr. DANIEL of Virginia;
Mr. ROE of New Jersey;
Mr. BROWN of California;
Mr. MCHUGH of New York; and
Mr. DWYER of New Jersey.

FLAT RATE COLA BENEFITS FOR SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. STANGELAND asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill for a flat rate COLA benefit for the Social Security system. This flat rate formula will ensure an economically sound Social Security system, assuring our senior citizens and future generations a level of security and dignity for the rest of their lives.

This is the answer to those who would freeze the cost-of-living allowance for our senior citizens, many of whom depend solely on their monthly Social Security check for survival as well as those who want to grant a full COLA under the present formula. Yet, at the same time, the U.S. Treasury saves billions of dollars. Preliminary figures, computed by the Actuary of the Social Security Administration, calculate to a net savings of $45.5 billion over the next 5 years.

COLA is a cost-of-living adjustment and one should presume that everyone's basic cost of living increases the same amount.

Under my plan, the COLA for 1986 would be $11.70 per month per recipient with no stipulations. The figure is computed by using the following formula: Multiplying the CPI for 1986—estimated at 4.1 percent—to the recipient at the 20-percentile income now receiving $286 a month from Social Security, the rate of increase per month is $11.70. This bill would give every Social Security recipient this $11.70 per month, regardless of the amount of money they receive presently per month.

This legislation is fair to all our seniors, and continues to help those at the lowest end of the system who are particularly in need. Those recipients at the lowest 20-percent monthly allotment level will receive a larger COLA under this proposal. The recipients at the highest 80-percent level will receive a lower monthly increase; however, all of the 36.5 million current Social Security recipients will be rewarded with an additional monthly reimbursement.

Here is a mechanism for saving billions of budget dollars, safeguarding the Social Security system for future generations, and still giving security to America's seniors.

HOUSE DEMOCRATIC OBSERVERS TO THE START TALKS

(Mr. O'NEILL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to make the following statement:

Pursuant to an agreement with the Republican leadership in the House on this side of the Capitol and with the joint leadership on the other side of the Capitol in the Senate, there will be observers from the House, eight from the Democratic side and I believe eight from the Republican side, to the START talks.

I desire to name at this particular time the observers to the START talks from the Democratic side:

Mr. WRIGHT of Texas, Mr. FASCELL of Florida, Mr. ADDABBO of New York, Mr. ASPIN of Wisconsin, Mr. DOWNEY of New York, Mr. DICKS of Washington, Mr. MOODY of Wisconsin, and Mr. TORRES of California.

FAMINE RELIEF DURING FISCAL YEAR 1985

(Mr. BURTON of Indiana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the United States will supply over $1 billion in famine relief during fiscal year 1985. Of this, over $150 million will go to Ethiopia. Of the 21 African countries getting aid—many friends of the United States—the vast majority of aid goes to a Communist government in Ethiopia.

We've all seen the pitiful pictures of the despairing people of Ethiopia. Yet despite our best efforts, and food relief from all over the world, people are still dying.

One major reason is that the Communist government of Ethiopia is using starvation as a political tool to suppress dissent. They are diverting much of our aid away from parts of the country they don't control, letting those people starve to death.

Few of our citizens are aware of this policy. This inhuman tactic is an outrage. The Communists are starving innocent children in their own land to further the cause of communism. Once again, Communists show how little they value life.

Communism is still as ugly as it has been—and always will be. If you don't believe that, look at Ethiopia.

WE CARE CHARITY DRIVE OF KOKOMO, IN

(Mr. HILLIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to publicly congratulate the thousands of men, women, and children who made the 1984 We Care charity drive in my hometown of Kokomo, IN, the most successful ever. For 11 years, We Care charities have collected more than three-quarters of a million dollars in cash and nearly that amount in clothing for the less fortunate of north-central Indiana. More than 67,000 people have had a Merry Christmas, thanks to the kindness and compassion of the volunteers of We Care. Last Christmas, a record $152,000 in cash plus $80,000 in food, clothing, and toys brought smiles to hundreds of families that otherwise would have had nothing under the tree or on the table. Nowhere was the spirit of Christmas more alive than in the happy faces of Kokomo's children as they went door to door collecting coins for the needy in their community. From Delco Electronics' donation of $12,000 to the nickels and dimes brought in by grade schoolers, every volunteer deserves our thanks and a pat on the back for a job well done.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO EXTEND THE GENERAL REVENUE SHARING PROGRAM FOR 3 ADDITIONAL YEARS

(Mr. HORTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to extend the Local Government Fiscal Assistance Act, commonly known as the General Revenue Sharing Program. I am joined in sponsorship of this bill by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

The 98th Congress very wisely acted to reauthorize general revenue sharing until September 30, 1986, and I am hopeful that this new 99th Congress will extend the program for another 3 years through fiscal year 1989.

In 1972, the State and Local Fiscal Assistance Act was signed into law. It marked an important step toward decentralization of governmental authority by allowing State and local officials to participate in allocating Federal tax dollars. The act has been reauthorized with amendments on three occasions since that time—in 1976, 1980, and 1983. As we have approached each of these deadlines for program renewal, extensive hearings have been conducted by the Committee on Government Operations, on which I have the privilege of serving as the ranking minority member. It is very clear from the testimony received that general revenue sharing has widespread support across the country from all levels of government as well as the public.

The General Revenue Sharing Program is a model of efficiency. The regulatory burden and administrative costs imposed by the program are minimal, and the benefits to recipient units of government are enormous. Since its inception, the General Revenue Sharing Program has disbursed over $75 billion nationwide to eligible State and local governments. Units of government in my home State of New York have received approximately $8.2 billion over the life of the program.

In my opinion, the major key to the success of general revenue sharing is the transfer of decisionmaking authority from Federal bureaucrats in Washington to local officials who are best positioned to determine local priorities. Communities throughout the country have used revenue sharing funds for a variety of projects, including police and fire protection equipment, library construction, mass transportation, park and recreation facilities, and social service programs. The General Revenue Sharing Program allows the elected officials closest to the problem to evaluate their communities' situations and respond to citizen demands.

Another important aspect of the program is its predictability. The shared revenues are distributed at regular quarterly intervals in discernable amounts, permitting local officials to plan and budget without fear of sudden termination. The funds support essential day-to-day services in approximately 39,000 local communities. In many cases, these services would be eliminated or financed entirely with higher taxes should the Revenue Sharing Program be allowed to expire.

The measure I am introducing today is a 3-year reauthorization of the program—pure and simple. The local government share would remain as an entitlement funded at $4.6 billion annually, as it is presently.

The General Revenue Sharing Program has proven to be a highly successful program by meeting its intended objectives—providing unencumbered funds with which localities can better perform their jobs, strengthening local political processes, and revitalizing the federal system. I urge my colleagues to join me in expressing confidence in our local governments by supporting the extension of this program.

REPEAL MOTOR VEHICLE RECORD-KEEPING PROVISIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BROWN of California). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LOEFFLER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. LOEFFLER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, for myself and for Messrs, ARMEY, BARTLETT, BARTON, BOULTER, COLEMAN of Texas, COMBEST DELAY, FIELDS, FROST, LEATH, STENHOLM, SWEENEY, and WILSON, legislation to repeal section 179(b) of the Tax Reform Act of 1984, which imposed significant new recordkeeping requirements on taxpayers utilizing passenger vehicles and other personal property in their business pursuits. Under this new requirement, taxpayers must maintain adequate "contemporaneous" records in order to claim tax deduction for business use of motor vehicles and other personal property such as computers.

These new substantiation requirements were included in the 1984 Tax Reform Act in an attempt to strengthen and improve compliance with tax provisions limiting deductions to actual business use of certain property. However, the effect of the "contemporaneous" record-keeping requirement contained in the statute, together with the subsequent Internal Revenue Service regulations implementing this provision, is to impose a massive and intrusive paperwork burden on individuals and businesses across the country.

While full compliance with the Tax Code should be encouraged, the practical application of the new requirements will severely impair the ability of millions of taxpayers, including farmers, ranchers and small businessmen, to conduct business efficiently.

Just last week, the IRS announced that in response to the tremendous amount of negative comment received with respect to temporary regulations issued last fall, the IRS would be announcing shortly a number of revisions to the temporary regulations. This is a welcome development and I wholeheartedly support the efforts of the IRS to introduce a little rationality in its implementation of the law. Unfortunately however, the basic problem lies with the statute itself, and requires a legislative rather than a regulatory solution.

While the impact of the new requirement—specifically for "contemporaneous" recordkeeping—may be mitigated by IRS exemptions for various categories of taxpayers and other changes, this approach could well result in a potentially inequitable application of the law. It makes far better sense to correct the problem at its source, the statute itself, by repealing the new "contemporaneous" recordkeeping requirement and returning the substantiation standard to that of previous law.

Under prior law, taxpayers were required to substantiate their claims for business deductions by adequate records or other evidence corroborating the taxpayers' statements. These records were not required to be contemporaneous with the claimed expenses; rather, taxpayers were allowed to claim deductions if they could "reasonably reconstruct" their expenses. These records were required to show the amount, time, place, and business purpose of the expense.

This is the standard to which I propose we return. Compliance with and respect for our tax system are not well-served by imposing unreasonable and counterproductive paperwork burdens on our citizens. These new recordkeeping requirements are an egregious example of legislative intent gone awry. Quite frankly, they are unworkable and are forcing honest, hard-working taxpayers to the fringe of dishonesty.●

MR. WILL: A CENTURY OF UNIQUENESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to extend to my good friend, Mr. Will Parks, a happy birthday. Today is a special birthday for him. It was 100 years ago today that Mr. Will, as he is known, was born. In his 100 years, Mr. Will has lived a very intriguing and unique life.

He went to college to be an architect, and was apparently very successful at it. He worked for the famous architect Roger Bacon and helped design the columns for the Lincoln Memorial. Regardless of the success he met in his career, Mr. Will yearned to return to his hometown of Trimble, TN, which he did. Since that day many, many years ago, he has served as the town's mayor, a member of the Dyer County Court, and has been a highly successful businessman and farmer.

Will Parks continues to be a vigorous and active man in his community. He walks to his office each day. That may be one of the reasons he is celebrating his 100th birthday. I want to extend to him my sincerest wish for a happy birthday today and many more in the future. I also want to include in the RECORD a recent newspaper story on Mr. Will which appeared in the Union City Daily Messenger.

[From the Union City Daily Messenger, Dec. 26, 1984]

MR. WILL: A CENTURY OF UNIQUENESS

(By Farris Vaden)

On Jan. 28th, William Hamilton Parks, retired banker, civic and church leader, farmowner, philanthropist, and lifelong resident of Trimble, will celebrate his 100th birthday. That in itself is a remarkable event. But on my visit to see him a few days ago, I found that he has enjoyed a lifetime of remarkable events.

"Mr. Will" is a distinguished-looking man of slender build who carries himself as if he were many years younger. He goes to his office daily, usually walking the two or three blocks from his home. Since his wife, Carolyn Smythe, formerly of Memphis, died several years ago, he lives alone in a handsome two-story colonial home. His son, Hamilton, and his wife, live next door in the family compound, Parks Acres, and check on him frequently.

Will Parks' ancestors were among the first settlers in this area and his grandfather, Jesse Pierce, founded Trimble in 1872. "My great-grandfather, John Pierce, came to West Tennessee in 1823 and homesteaded 200 acres. My present home is on part of his original land. He left Nashville by boat, traveling down the Cumberland, Ohio, and Mississippi rivers to Dyersburg. Then he traveled overland by oxen to this spot. He drove off the Indians, killed the bears, cleared some land and raised himself a big family. My great-grandfather, my grandfather, and my father have all farmed this land. I have farmed it, and I think I am fortunate that my son, Hamilton, chose to obtain a BS degree in business agriculture and now manages the Parks' farming and agri-business operations," Mr. Parks said. His farmland, now handed down to his two children and five grandchildren, encompasses several thousand acres bordering the Obion, Dyer, Gibson County lines midway between Dyersburg and Union City.

Mr. Will was the only boy in the class of 1903 of the Dyersburg High School. All the others had dropped out to go to work or to get married. The 12 girls in the class made life quite interesting for a teenage boy. They played pranks on him, wrote love letters to him, and at recess, played games with him. "Can you imagine playing leapfrog with girls wearing long dresses and pantaloons? They rolled up their dresses under their arms. It was quite a sight!" he exclaimed. In memory of the class, he has set up a scholarship fund which sends graduates to Tennessee area universities of their choice each year. Some 20 students have taken advantage of the fund.

There was never any question about his attending college. He chose Vanderbilt University in Nashville. It was a relative newcomer on the scene, but it had already established a solid reputation for its academic work.

Vanderbilt and Will parted company during his sophomore year, however. Chancellor Kirkland sent for him to come to his office. "When I arrived, the chancellor was busy at his desk writing. He never looked up so I just stood there. After quite a while I turned to leave. 'Did you want to see me, Will?' the chancellor asked. No sir, I replied. 'Well, I want to see you!' Then he gave me the bad news. 'I have talked to your professors about your work and it's clear you are just not ready for college work. You should drop out and go to some good prep school for awhile and then come back and finish your college work,' Kirkland explained."

That's just what young Will did—well, sort of. He enrolled in a school "up east" by the name of Harvard. "I made the honor roll the first year I was there," he stated. "I sent a copy of my grades to Chancellor Kirkland." He graduated from Harvard in 1912 with a degree in architecture.

Will ran into some interesting people while at Harvard. Robert Benchley and Kermit Roosevelt (Teddy's son), were classmates. "I lived for awhile in the room that Teddy used to live in. One night there was a knock on the door and a gentleman told me that he (Teddy) wanted to see his old room, so I got to meet him." Will described Roosevelt as being short, broad and fast talking.

For awhile during his student years, Will played baseball on one of the varsity teams. It was during this time that he met another interesting character. "I was playing first base on the second team and Joe Kennedy was playing first base on the first team. That was before the Kennedys became aristocratic. Joe was just a typical Irish kid from Boston."

While at Harvard, Will, along with several of his classmates, decided to make a trip to England. To pay their expenses for transportation, they got a job on a cattle boat, a rather common thing for college boys of the time. He was surprised to find his father's brand on some of the cattle on the boat.

The trip proved to be more exciting than he had expected, in fact he almost landed in jail. One of the first places the group visited was Westminster Abbey. And there they came upon the royal throne—a national monument dear to the hearts of all Englishmen. All their monarchs have been crowned on this throne for several hundred years. You can well imagine what ran through the mind of an American college boy. Looking about and finding no guards in the area, he climbed the fence surrounding the throne and with a royal gesture, took a seat. But lo, his luck ran out. No sooner ensconced on the throne, he heard a gruff voice say, "Young man, you are under arrest." "They called me an impudent American who had insulted the dignity of the English people," he remembered. "I was told to leave the city before sundown or face imprisonment. A little man from Scotland Yard, and wearing a black derby, followed me to the hotel and from there to the dock to catch a boat to France. As the boat pulled away, I waved my hand and he shook his fist at me," Mr. Parks said.

Will feels he has atoned for his mischief by returning for Queen Elizabeth's Jubilee Celebration in the summer of 1937.

Will's first job was with the New York firm of Roger Bacon. It had just been commissioned to design the Lincoln Memorial to be located in Washington. The young architect was assigned the task of designing the columns for the monument. Construction was interrupted, however, by World War I and it was not completed until 1922. "It cost $11 million at the time," he explains. "It would cost many times that amount today." Will can proudly boast that more people see a bit of his design work every day than any other living architect. Not only do visitors to the memorial see his work, but it is pictured on the $5 bill and the penny.

When World War I broke out Will joined the Army Air Corps. The war ended however, before he saw any action. Shortly thereafter, he did get to see Europe—his parents gave him a trip around the world—the first of three such trips he has made. Along with a cousin, the late Ed Parks of Union City, the two spent eleven months on the trip. It involved travel by boat, train, donkey, camel, and rickshaw. "I was engaged to be married at the time and because I felt guilty, I took my wife around the world in 1967. The second trip, partly by air, took only six weeks.

"I guess the most beautiful sight I have ever seen was the pink snow in Siberia in 1919. The phenomenon occurred when the red dust from the Gobi Desert blew into a snowstorm and caused the snow to turn pink," Mr. Parks said.

City life didn't appeal to Will, however; at least not New York. Memories of the "good life" on the farm with plenty of time for hunting and fishing proved to be too strong. So it was no surprise to anyone that he soon gave up the hustle and bustle of the city and came back to the farm. The folks at Trimble welcomed him back and soon made him mayor, a position he held for many years. Later he became a member of the Dyer County Court where he also served for a number of years.

Mr. Parks is quite proud of his mini-museum located in a one-room log cabin nearby. "It was part of my great-grandfather's log house that he built over the hill there in 1823. When the house was torn down in 1937, I brought this one room here," he explains.

The museum is filled with all kinds of interesting things from the early years of this area. Many are from family members and relate to his ancestors: his grandmother's coffee mill, a rusty broadax, a hairball from the stomach of a cow, a spinning wheel, to name a few.

In a little glass case is a bear grease lamp that once belonged to Davy Crockett. Will is sure about the ownership. He explains: "In the safe of the old bank in Trimble we found an envelope dated June 6, 1891. There was a note saying, 'Please don't open for 100 years, June 6, 1991.'

Well, I couldn't wait, so I opened it. Inside was a copy of the Trimble Meteor, Vol. 1, No. 1, the first newspaper printed in Trimble. In the newspaper was this item: 'Mr. Jesse Pierce, a prosperous farmer and esteemed citizen of our town, has brought to our office an old relic of the early days of this country. It was once the property of that old hero and hunter, Davy Crockett, who chased bison and elk over this now fertile land. It fell into the hands of Mr. Pierce's father, and has been preserved by the family for years.' That's when I knew what I had," Will said.

Another prized item in the museum is a copy of his grandfather's (Jesse Pierce) request dated July 4, 1864 for $740 from the federal government. "The federal army camped on his land and stole a lot of food for the men and horses. Granddaddy said he didn't get mad and was going to let them have the supplies, but when they tore up a mile of his rail fence to cook the meat, he lost his temper and billed them. He never got paid. I wish I had the interest—they could keep the $740," Mr. Parks said as he reviewed the bill for two mules, 100 bushels of corn, 1,000 pounds of hay, a barrel of sugar, 3,000 pounds of pork, and 1,000 feet of rail fence.

The sight of an old pine coffin in the back of the museum caught my attention. Mr. Will slid back a panel. "He's just a skeleton," he said, "with a bullet hole in his head." "Who?" I asked. "Why, it's Jesse James, the famed outlaw," he replied with a twinkle in his eyes. "Hello, Jesse." Jesse's lower jaw wagged up and down as if answering "Howdy." Mr. Parks has run a small cord to Jesse's jaw and, when he pulls it, the jaw wags. "When I was mayor of Trimble several years ago, a street carnival came to town. In one exhibit was this skeleton which the man claimed to be Jesse James, the famous western outlaw. I sorta doubted it, but people were sure paying ten cents to see him. Well early Sunday morning this man knocked on my door."

"Mr. Parks," he said, "I'm in trouble. I got into a crap game with the boys last night and they cleaned me. I want to borrow twenty bucks to get to Dyersburg."

Parks replied, "I couldn't loan you $20 without some security."

"Well, I guess I could let you keep Jesse—and I'll come back Monday and bring the money and get him."

"He didn't say what Monday," Will said, "and so I've had old Jesse on my hands since 1935."

"Jesse's been exhibited in quite a number of places. He made national television and was written about all the way to New York. I insured him for $1,000 when I loaned him out—I was afraid he might be kidnapped. But he wasn't, and the folks brought him back in a hearse." A man wanted to buy him for a thousand dollars, but I wouldn't sell him. I'm not really sure it's old Jesse, but it makes a good story. And over the years I've sort of gotten attached to him."

Will was only 7 years old when his father took him to the Chicago World's Fair in 1892. He enjoyed himself so much that he has been to all twelve fairs that have been held in the U.S. since then.

Just two days before it closed in November, Will made a visit to the Louisiana World Exposition in New Orleans. The folks there sent him a special invitation and they rolled out the red carpet for him and gave him VIP treatment. While the fair was a disaster financially, and some even gave it the same rating aesthetically, Will rated it as one of the best that he has seen. He should know, for he has seen them all.

And what about the next century? "I've slowed down quite a bit," he replied. "I don't have any plans right now," he said. Well, Mr. Will may be a little "slower" during the next 100, but one thing I'm sure of—it will be packed with a lot of exciting events. He is still alert and full of energy. We wish him many more years of excitement as well as accomplishment!●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, on Monday I introduced H.R. 752, a bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to ensure an orderly transition to the new Educational Assistance Program established by title VII of the DOD Authorization Act of 1985, Public Law 98-525, signed by the President October 19, 1984.

The Department of Defense has alerted me that the military services are experiencing difficulty in recruiting as the result of a provision which establishes July 1, 1985, as the beginning date of the new GI bill. As passed by the House, the new GI bill would have had an effective date of October 1, 1984, thus avoiding the recruitment difficulties now being experienced. In conference, however, the Senate insisted on an effective date of July 1, 1985. Consequently, those high quality young people the services are so anxious to recruit are delaying their enlistment until they can qualify for the new GI bill—that is, July 1, 1985, or later.

Clearly, a massive number of recruits all enlisting on the same day will not allow for timely recruitment and training scheduling. The bill I have introduced will amend the July 1 date to the date of enactment of the new legislation, thereby avoiding a tidal wave of recruits which would severely disrupt recruitment and training in our Armed Forces.

In view of the serious problems already experienced in the field, it is my intention, with the support of the Department of Defense, to mark up and report this bill as soon as possible so that it can be considered in the House.

BILL TO REPEAL IRS REPORTING REQUIREMENTS ON USE OF VEHICLES FOR BUSINESS PURPOSES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to repeal new Internal Revenue Service reporting requirements for individuals who use their vehicles for business purposes. Under a provision of last year's Deficit Reduction Act, such taxpayers are required to keep "adequate contemporaneous records" in order to receive business deductions for use of their vehicles. The regulations issued by the IRS to enforce this provision would force taxpayers to keep excessively detailed logs of their vehicle use in order to receive deductions that formerly were routine.

Clearly all of us are interested in making sure that the tax laws are enforced vigorously and are complied with by all of our taxpayers. But the contemporaneous records provision and the IRS regulations to implement it go too far. The regulations impose an unfair paperwork burden on millions of small businessmen, farmers, and others who use their vehicles for business purposes.

Mr. Speaker, the IRS should go back to the drawing boards. If a serious problem of unjustly claiming business use for vehicles and similar property exists, IRS should devise a new way of ensuring compliance with the provision of the tax law that doesn't force our Nation's taxpayers to spend hours of their business day making notes. For that reason, the bill I am introducing today requires the Secretary of the Treasury to undertake a study to determine how much of a problem there is in this area and to report back to Congress on alternative methods of enforcement that are consistent with the goal of reducing paperwork requirements on individual taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, as the author of the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1980, which was aimed at reducing the paperwork burden imposed on citizens by Federal agencies, I am particularly concerned about this new IRS provision and its effect on our citizens. It runs against the philosophy of the Paperwork Reduction Act for the IRS to impose this requirement on millions of taxpayers.

I hope that the Ways and Means Committee will take swift action on this problem and will consider my legislation as one promising approach.●

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HONORABLE GILLIS W. LONG

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAUX] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, today we will be hearing from our colleagues who knew, and who served with, our recently departed colleague, Congressman GILLIS LONG.

I remember quite well when GILLIS LONG first came to this body for his second term as a Member of the House of Representatives, back in 1973. I remember at that time sitting here in this Chamber with GILLIS. he had just come off of a very difficult and very trying 2-year race for Governor in the State of Louisiana. That race was like only Louisiana can have a Governor's race, it was excruciatingly difficult and very long.

GILLIS had run third and had just barely missed the runoff back in 1972. It was GILLIS' second attempt at that time to seek the governorship of the State of Louisiana.

In talking to GILLIS LONG on the f' or of this Chamber back in 1973 I remember very distinctly the words that GILLIS told me. He said that he was disappointed in not having been elected, as you can imagine, to the governorship after having tried for the second time. He told me that he was coming to Washington and looked forward to serving, but that he was going to serve in a quiet way and would hope that he would be able to do so without a lot fanfare and that he was going to do so without anyone noticing that he was here in the Congress.

I think he said that at that time because he was tired from an exhausting race. He indicated that he wanted to do his duty and to serve the Eighth Congressional District. he did not want to make waves.

Well, for all of you who know GILLIS and know the record that he has left in this Congress, we can honestly say that GILLIS was quiet and GILLIS wasn't noticed for approximately, maybe, 1 day.

He soon, I think, shook off that Governor's race and was appointed to the very powerful Rules Committee and threw himself into the service on that committee and into the service of this House and into the service of the people of the Eighth Congressional District with great enthusiasm as only GILLIS could bring to this job, to this position and this vocation which all of us serve.

Looking back on his service on the Rules Committee, many political observers made the comment to GILLIS at that time that he was making a very serious mistake in agreeing to serve on the Rules Committee because they looked back and remembered that his votes for the Rules Committee, back in 1963-64 contributed to his defeat to the Congress in 1965.

Many people at that time, in 1973, simply said, "Boy, is GILLIS LONG making a big mistake."

Little did we know what turn of events would happen. GILLIS went on to serve with great distinction on the Rules Committee and handled many times the most complicated rules that the Rules Committee ever reported out, with great skill.

We in Louisiana are going to remember GILLIS LONG not only for the complicated rules that he was able to get the Rules Committee to report to the Congress, but probably more often for the complicated rules that GILLIS was able to prevent from ever coming to the House floor because they were premature.

GILLIS LONG suffered severe heart problems which ultimately required a triple bypass. Many people would probably retire to a rocking chair but GILLIS LONG instead decided to run for the chairmanship of our House Democratic caucus, a position that no one from Louisiana had ever held before. Again, old political observers back in Louisiana and elsewhere said, "Boy, is GILLIS LONG making a serious mistake."

Little did we know how wrong they were going to be again. His service as chairman of our caucus has made our party and our Government better. We all make many mistakes as we go through life, but I can assure you that it can never and will never be said of GILLIS LONG, that he ever made the mistake of not giving it everything that he had.

Politics was his chosen profession, and he carried it out with enthusiasm and distinction that can serve as a standard for all of us.

To his wife Cathy and their children Janis and George, we all offer them our greatest support in these very difficult times. Cathy especially formed a very unique partnership with GILLIS, both personally with great love and affection and also politically, as part of a very special team dedicated to serving this institution and the people of the Eighth Congressional District of Louisiana.

It is with great pleasure that we now hear that Cathy will now seek the office of our departed colleague, GILLIS LONG, and try to continue in that same distinctive service.

GILLIS LONG will be remembered by all of us here today, but his real achievement in life is that he will always be remembered by the people that he served so well.

I yield to my colleague from Louisiana, BUDDY ROEMER.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague and good friend, JOHN BREAUX, for setting aside this time today for several of us to give our thoughts about our departed colleague, GILLIS LONG.

Mr. Speaker, 6 days ago Members of this House traveled to Alexandria, LA, to pay final respects to one of our most distinguished colleagues, GILLIS LONG.

Many of those making the sad journey to our State knew GILLIS LONG as an effective and respected legislator. Many knew him as the visionary chairman of the House Democratic caucus, and influential member of the powerful Rules Committee and the next chairman of the Joint Economic Committee.

Many of his colleagues in the House also knew GILLIS LONG as a courageous man willing to put the principles of equality and justice ahead of a political career.

His colleagues knew GILLIS LONG as all that and more.

I'm lucky enough to say I also knew GILLIS LONG as a friend. A friend who was ever ready to advise a green young colleague. A friend always prepared to help in times of need. A friend willing to share the wealth of his experience and knowledge.

Now, I know there were times when GILLIS LONG and I disagreed on particular issues. We didn't always vote the same way here.

But that never bothered him. For he was wise enough to realize that true friendship cannot depend upon voting records or political opinion. He recognized that friendship is much stronger than the shifting sands of political concerns.

I was lucky to know GILLIS LONG as a friend. And we were all lucky that he devoted his life to the service of his district, his State, and his Nation.

A very smart man once said, "Knowing is not enough; we must apply. Willing is not enough; we must do."

That was GILLIS LONG. A public servant both knowing and willing, one who applied himself, one who accomplished so very much.

A newspaper said it well: "As this new Congress gathers, the Democrats will miss this Louisianian on their side of the House. His State and Nation will miss him more."

We'll all miss him. And we'll never forget him.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank our colleague. I now yield to a distinguished Member from Texas [Mr. FROST].

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, it is hard to really do justice to GILLIS LONG's service in the Congress of the United States. I had the privilege of serving with GILLIS on the Rules Committee, of working with him in the Democratic caucus on a variety of projects.

GILLIS was a rare individual, an expert in procedure who also cared very deeply about substance. GILLIS' service on the Rules Committee simply cannot be replaced. GILLIS was an outstanding tactician for our committee and shaped much of what we did in that body, and all of us who continued to serve on that committee in our own way will try and fill the gap that GILLIS has left, but they are very large shoes to fill.

I was privileged to work with GILLIS in the Democratic caucus. GILLIS, in one of his first acts when he became chairman of the caucus, established the Committee on Party Effectiveness, made up of a number of Members of the House from various political persuasions and from various regions. It was this committee, meeting on a regular basis during the last 4 years, that helped in a small way to influence the shape of the Democratic Party and the shape of the party within this House, not just for this year but perhaps for many, many years to come.

GILLIS' influence will be continued to be felt through the actions of those Members that he inspired to take part in the caucus, to think about substance, to think about where this party is going and to act on that.

I miss GILLIS very much, and I know that all of my colleagues, whether they agreed with GILLIS on individual pieces of legislation, or individual stands or not, feel the same way.

I think back to the last fight that GILLIS was involved in in the Rules Committee on behalf of his State and on behalf of his region, a fight that he won just this last fall that involved natural gas legislation that was harmful to Louisiana and to our part of the country.

GILLIS demonstrated his mastery of both procedure and substance in that last fight, and it is as the captain of that last fight that I will remember GILLIS LONG.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentleman from Texas.

I will now yield to the distinguished gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BURTON].

Mrs. BURTON of California. I rise to honor my colleague and friend, GILLIS LONG. He was a truly outstanding Member of the House of Representatives and will forever have a significant place in the history of this body.

GILLIS served in the 88th Congress with my husband, and I have known GILLIS and his wife, Cathy, for 21 years. Cathy and I have been involved with other congressional wives in numerous political activities, and I am very pleased that she will be running in the special election to replace her husband.

GILLIS remained a national Democrat in his stands on issues, even though it cost him his seat at one time in Congress early in his career.

As caucus chairman, he led efforts to use the talents and knowledge of Members of the House in developing Democratic Party stands on issues. He will deeply missed by his colleagues and by his party. I extend my deepest sympathies to Cathy and his two wonderful children.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentlewoman from California.

I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORTON].

Mr. HORTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I join my colleagues today in paying tribute to a fellow Representative, a close personal friend, an outstanding Member of Congress, and a proud member of the distinguished Long family of Louisiana—GILLIS LONG.

GILLIS and I came to Congress in 1963. In addition to both of us beginning our congressional careers in the 88th Congress, we were both raised in Louisiana and proudly claim Louisiana State University as our alma mater. He was a good friend.

GILLIS was also a good friend to this institution. He served it and his Louisiana constituents with a strong sense of responsibility and commitment. His work on the Rules Committee is a testament to his dedication. He could be a formidable opponent on legislative issues, as well as a strong and valuable ally. His work and contribution to the betterment of this institution, and hence, our country, will not be forgotten.

To Cathy Long, Nancy joins me in offering our prayers during this difficult period. We can only say that his loss is one shared by many; his determined spirit touched the lives of many of us in this Congress and across the State of Louisiana and these United States. I am proud to have known him and to have counted him as both a trusted colleague and friend.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY].

Mr. OBEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to join those who were paying their respects to GILLIS LONG today. I remember the first time I ever met GILLIS. Dick Bolling used to have a group of Members with whom he would get together regularly in Otis Pike's office. Shortly after GILLIS was reelected to the Congress after he had been gone for some time, he came into the meeting with Dick and I had never heard of a GILLIS LONG. I had heard of Speedy Long, I had heard of RUSSELL LONG, Earl Long, but I had never heard of GILLIS. It took about an hour in that meeting for me to realize that GILLIS LONG was one tough cookie. He had a quality which is in very strong need in a political system which is called guts. I think throughout his career he exhibited that. It was very difficult for him to make some of the choices he made on issues, especially in regard to civil rights. But he made them because he understood they were right and they were in the best interests of the country and he stuck by them.

The other thing that I think made him such an outstanding Member of this House is that he was truly an institutional man. He did recognize that before you could succeed as an individual Member of this House, this place itself had to work and it had to work well. He recognized that because the interests of the House had to come before many other things he recognized that on occasion, even though you had a political advantage, it was wise not to press it for the greater good of everyone concerned and for the greater good of the country. He stuck by that rule.

He was also one of those who tried to merge the pressures for economic growth in this country with the pressures for equity and to try to fuse both into a rational set of policies for his party and for the country.

I think he will be remembered as a person who was a problem solver rather than a rhetorician.

I very greatly regret his passing. I just want to extend my sincere sympathy to his wife, Cathy.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. O'NEILL].

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to thank Congressman BREAUX. I think it is a beautiful idea to have this remembrance of an old and dear friend.

I probably knew GILLY LONG as well as—and longer than—most Members of the House. In 1958 I was a member of the Committee on Contested Elections. That committee is out of existence now, but in those particular days the chief counsel was GILLY LONG, a young, able, and talented fellow, who served the committee very well. I got to know him and to respect him.

Then in 1962 he ran for the Congress and was elected. The opening day of that session is one in the history of this Congress that historians write about. It was to break the coalition between the southern Democrats and the Republicans who had allied themselves under the leadership of "Judge" Smith of Virginia. The question came of enlarging the Rules Committee. GILLY LONG was a man of courage and foresight. He appreciated that in our democracy the power of the Rules Committee must be such that the leadership can bring legislation to the floor, which was not the case at that time.

So he voted with the majority on that day to enable us—for the future of this legislative body—to be able to get the legislation on the floor. This hurt him badly back home where he represented a very conservative district.

GILLY was defeated for reelection. At a later date he ran for Governor, always doing well, but a "bridesmaid and never the bride."

He came back to this Congress in 1973 and again showed extreme courage as legislation came along, especially civil rights legislation. GILLY had the respect and admiration of every Member of this Congress on both sides of the aisle.

I have seen caucus chairmen come and go. I always say that every whip, every majority leader, every chairman of the caucus always does a better job than the one before them. They take the inequities and mistakes of the past and correct them. GILLY was truly the most forceful that I ever saw.

He and Cathy, Millie, and I have traveled together. There was a bond of friendship that had grown between the O'Neill family and the Long family and I know that Millie joins me and has already expressed to Catherine our sincerest, deepest sympathy for the loss of GILLY. He truly was a great American.

Mr. Speaker, I have in my hands the remarks that I made at the services in Alexandria, LA, last week. Cathy called and asked me if I would join in the eulogy. She paid me a great honor. I would like to include my remarks at this time:

Reverend Clergy, Cathy, George and Janis, my colleagues, friends and admirers of Gillis Long.

Gillis Long was my friend. We served together on the House Committee on Elections 26 years ago. He was a young man of achievement with a great future ahead of him.

Soon after we met he was elected to Congress in the heady days of the New Frontier. In his first term he quickly stood up for what was right for the House and what was right for the country. As a result, he waited awhile for his second term.

As it turned out, the reputation he gained for courage and conviction made up for the years he lost in seniority. Upon his return to the House, beginning with his service on the House Rules Committee, he quickly rose in the leadership of the House.

Gillis was popular, knowledgeable and influential. His colleagues looked to him for guidance and he always listened to them for advice.

He was a conciliator. He was a consensus-builder. He was a unifier.

We welcomed change. But he never wanted to leave anyone behind. He sought to persuade rather than to punish. He fought to reconcile rather than to divide.

Recently, he advocated that his party needed to recapture the "vital center" of the American electorate. Well, Gillis Long himself was the "vital center" of the House leadership, the House Rules Committee, and the Democratic caucus.

And of course, he was the "vital center" of his family, his community and his district.

Gillis was a doer, he made things happen and he made things better. He was impatient for results, but he was always patient with people.

He cared deeply about his constituents, his colleagues and his countrymen. As a result, they cared about him.

John Kennedy reminded us that "we should not forget those acts of courage with which men lived". Well we will never forget the courage with which Gillis lived every day in face of illness during the last several years. We will never forget the courage he displayed in his first term in Congress. We will never forget how bravely he served his country in World War II.

His courage, his commitment and his compassion will remain in the center of our lives and our experiences for years to come.

Gillis was a strong voice in the House. His was a voice of conviction and of moderation. His voice will no longer be heard in the House. His vote will no longer be recorded in the Chamber. But I promise you his influence remains because his memory lives on in our minds, in our hearts and in our enduring respect and admiration for him and for what he stood for.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. O'NEILL] for his eloquent remarks.

Mr. Speaker, what I would like to do for everyone's information is yield to the elected leadership on both sides of the aisle and then to the Louisiana delegation members and then to others in rank of seniority.

Mr. Speaker, I yield at this time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT].

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman from Louisiana for yielding.

I join with my colleagues here today in expressing our sadness at the loss of one of the best legislators I have seen operate here in the House in the 16 years that I have been in this city. He was my neighbor over there in Louisiana. That led us on many occasions to work together on legislation where he had a common interest.

He was an outstanding member of the Rules Committee. I served on the Rules Committee with him for 10 years. He in many ways changed the direction of the Rules Committee as a consummate politician, technician, and tactician. I always appreciated, the fact that he had a real sense of this institution and consequently improved the operation of the House. He was interested in congressional oversight and trying to make sure that this body did take a look at what it had done. We worked closely together on the Legislative Process Subcommittee on sunset legislation and related oversight proposals. I was privileged to serve as the ranking Republican under his chairmanship, and he was always gracious to me.

Obviously, he did an outstanding job as the chairman of his party's caucus. I think he was revolutionary in the many ways that he tried to make it more active. We on this side of the aisle observed the leadership that he provided in that caucus.

I did work with him on many bipartisan issues and felt that when we worked together we were able to accomplish some positive things on legislation.

What meant more than anything else to me with GILLIS was that he was fair in the way that he dealt with me as a Member of the Rules Committee. As a Member of the House, he left a legacy here that we will all remember and appreciate. I think that the House is a better place because of the service of our friend and colleague, GILLIS LONG. I extend my feelings to his family on this great loss.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. I thank the gentleman from Louisiana for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, join with my colleagues in honoring the memory of our dear departed friend and former colleague, GILLIS LONG, of Louisiana.

When I was first elected to Congress in 1968, I came to this institution and was sworn in, took the oath of office in 1969, with the firm conviction that I would not be shackled by the history of prejudice and bias that had been associated by some people with Representatives from my native State during the last several decades.

I came here committed to ideals which I felt very alone in bringing to Congress from my region, to learn that there were other soul mates who were here with me and who had preceded me from the South with whom I associated and with whom I was comfortable ideologically and philosophically. Though GILLIS had a break in his service and he was not here in 1969 when I was sworn in, I soon learned of him. And when he returned a couple of years later, I respected him as a master craftsman of the art of politics, as a master Congressman who was committed not only to the people of his district in Louisiana that he represented in the U.S. Congress, but who was equally committed to a set of ideals which he brought with him as a standard by which he measured his performance in representing his constituents.

And I think most of all I admired the courage of this man in fulfilling the commitments that he had. He had the courage of his commitments. We were frequently visitors about the plight of our region and its part that it should play in national politics. We frequently conferred about matters of debate on the floor of the House. And after all of the work was done, he would lay politics aside and be the friend to me and other Members of Congress that we all knew him to be.

It is with great sadness that I stand here today, and it is with warmth and heartfelt condolence that I extend my feelings to his family and to especially Cathy, who shared GILLIS' work with him step by step each day that he served in Congress.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I thank my colleague from Louisiana for yielding to me. I want to thank him also for taking out this special order.

Mr. Speaker, I grew up in Louisiana, and I think it is safe to say that throughout my formative years I grew up in Louisiana hearing the name of GILLIS LONG repeated time and time again. The people of Louisiana knew him for his record as an outstanding statesman, they knew him for his record as a war veteran, during which service he received recognition for outstanding valor. He received the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart. But, most importantly, he was a master politician.

GILLIS LONG was the embodiment of the Democratic Party in Louisiana. He was politically and philosophically, I suppose, on the opposite side of the fence, the opposite side of the spectrum, from me. But I believe, in knowing GILLIS over these last 8 years that I have served in Congress, that we had a great deal in common. I know that we were friends, despite our political and philosophical differences. There is no doubt in my mind that Louisiana has suffered a great loss in his passing.

GILLIS had the politically famous name of LONG, but he came from relatively obscure and simple surroundings. He rose to prominence because he was a whirlwind of energy, an irrepressible campaigner, a formidable opponent, an inveterate liberal and a yellow-dog Democrat. But he was also a good guy, and you could trust him, you could count on his word. He did not hesitate to make alliances with people who did not necessarily share his views if it was for mutual political benefit. I recall one time when he shared the cost of a poll with Dave Treen who was thinking of running for Governor. GILLIS was also thinking of running for Governor. They got the same pollster, they put their money in together, shared the cost, and on the basis of that poll, Dave Treen decided ultimately to run for Governor and GILLIS LONG decided not to.

I remember one time, more close to my own political future, I suppose, he worked with me on reapportionment, to help secure his base, and mine, as it turned out, as far as our positions were concerned among our State legislators.

I have to say that GILLIS was remarkable in another context, for let any political adversary rue the day that he went up against GILLIS LONG, either on the campaign trail or on the legislative battlefield. GILLIS was merciless in his combative nature, and he could beat the toughest of odds when the time and circumstances were right.

The time never was right for GILLIS to have become Governor of Louisiana, and that was a goal he had set for himself at various times throughout his career. But that was not significant, for GILLIS was the consummate political maneuverer of Louisiana. His tentacles, his machinations, his ingenuity, and his integrity were always one step away from the Governor's mansion, regardless of who might have occupied it over the last 25 years.

GILLIS had friends in every corner of Louisiana and friends in cities and towns throughout this Nation of ours. And for those who did not count themselves among his friends, well, he could always be sure that at the very least he had their respect.

GILLIS LONG left his mark on Louisiana and on the Nation. He was throughout his entire life every ounce the "happy warrior" that the late Hubert Humphrey was, for he reveled in challenge, in politics, and in life.

As I mentioned earlier, I sometimes have often disagreed with GILLIS' positions on the issues, but you did not have to agree with GILLIS to know that he was one hell of a man.

I learned at his funeral that 2 weeks before he died GILLIS asked the delegate from the District of Columbia, WALTER FAUNTROY, to sing "The Impossible Dream" at his funeral ceremony. I think that song capsulizes GILLIS LONG's life, and you cannot help but admire a man who can face up to his unfortunate fate with such courage.

His lovely wife, Cathy, and his children, George and Janice, who now mourn his departure from this Earth, can later rejoice in the knowledge that GILLIS LONG lived his life and wasted nothing.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentleman from Louisiana for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT].

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the passing of GILLIS LONG leaves a void which will not be easily filled. GILLIS LONG determined early in his life that he would be a public man. His was no ordinary dream of mere personal ambition, of prestige, power, and popularity, though there would be nothing wrong with a young man dreaming of those things. His was a dream of a career in public service, the beneficiaries of which would be his people, his region, the small towns, and families with whom he grew up.

GILLIS began ardently and with the dedication, which he devoted to every task that he ever undertook, to prepare himself for this career. His education interrupted by the cruel cataclysm of World War II, he entered the Army as a private and rose to the rank of captain, slogging across Europe and earning the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart in service to our country.

Resuming his education, he graduated from Louisiana State University where he was elected president of the student body, and received his law degree. Then GILLIS began in his earnest, dedicated way to master the craft of lawmaking.

GILLIS LONG became a legislator's legislator, and a consummate politician; that word so much misunderstood and so frequently abused. But GILLIS knew that politics, which Webster defines as the science and art of government, is as necessary to the functioning of a free society as water is to the flow of a river. It does not have to be filthy and corrupted, and neither does the river, for man has the wisdom, if he has the will, to keep them both clean.

GILLIS soon was recognized as a man of conviction. When expediency might have justified a temporary sacrifice of principle in the face of implacable prejudice, GILLIS stood firm by his convictions. Because of this, he knew the personal anguish of political defeat, but never did defeat become defeatism, nor sour into personal selfpity.

GILLIS overcame those defeats demonstrating both the ability to be gracious in victory, which requires the skills of a gentleman, and to be gracious in defeat, which requires the fiber of a man. In Congress, we called upon him repeatedly when difficult tasks were required; when delicate negotiations were needed. He always came through.

GILLIS served as a sort of bridge across which Members of different geographic origins, of different generations and of different ideologies could communicate. He was creative, he was constructive, and in every way a model Member.

We mourn his passing, and as we do, we recall with honor and pride the distinction that he cast upon this Chamber. He reflected credit upon the legislative branch of Government, and credit upon the United States.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the distinguished majority leader for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize now the first lady of our delegation, Congresswoman LINDY BOGGS.

Mrs. BOGGS. I thank the gentleman for yielding and for taking this special order.

Mr. Speaker, GILLIS had left word to his beautiful Cathy that at the funeral exercises honoring him, he would like a simple, military funeral, and that he would like for the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] and me to deliver the eulogies, and he would like for WALTER FAUNTROY to sing "The Impossible Dream," which was his favorite song.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to have permission to include the remarks that I made in the eulogy at the service within the context of these special remembrances.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection.

Mrs. BOGGS. In the eulogy, Mr. Speaker, I said that Louisiana had lost a stalwart son; that the Nation had lost a determined patriot, and that each of us, individually, had lost a precious friend. GILLIS' service to our State was absolutely immeasurable. He was a defender and a promoter of all of its resources, its human resources and its beautiful natural resources. He was also a promoter of its industry; of its trade; of its commerce, nationally and internationally. Most of all, he was a supporter of its people and of their problems and of their needs.

You have just heard the majority leader talk about GILLIS' patriotism on the battlefield of war, and all of us in this House know about his patriotism on the battlefield of politics. We know, as the great song from the Man From LaMancha says, that he gave his last ounce of courage to bring all of us beyond the unreachable star.

He was indeed a great promoter of this House, of the institution of this House. We have heard the Speaker reminisce today about the young counsel to the committee that handled the Speaker's own situation when he first came to the House. My husband, Hale, was the chairman of that committee, and selected GILLIS LONG as the chief counsel.

Their friendship grew and blossomed and all of Hale's love of this House was somehow transferred to and implemented in GILLIS' feelings. He, in turn, attracted men and women of tremendous abilities to the service of this House and to politics and to the Democratic Party and to the State of Louisiana in political service. True friend we all know he was. There was never a time when, individually or collectively, he was not ready to befriend the Members of this House. Whether it was in a small, personal gesture or tremendous help in a difficult campaign, at home or in legislation, GILLIS was there always to be helpful to us. During the whole time he was aided and abetted by his wife, Cathy. She is a true professional in her own right, and it is with great pride and expectation that I hope that she will be running for election in the special election to bring some of the love of Louisiana, some of the strength and courage, some of the friendship and devotion to this House that we have lost in GILLIS. I hope that Cathy will consider bringing some of all of this back to us.

I want to extend to her and to Janice and George, to Floyd and to all the other family members our deepest sympathy, our dearest love, and our great thanks for sharing GILLIS with us for so many years.

Mr. Speaker, with your gracious permission, the expressions of eulogy that I delivered at GILLIS' funeral services now follow:

Each of us here today, and thousands of others such as we, has lost an affectionate friend; Louisiana has lost a stalwart son of an illustrious Louisiana political family and the Nation has lost a loyal and determined patriot.

Our personal grief has been assuaged by the national and international expressions of praise for his solid accomplishments and his unique contributions to the stability of our national economy, to the institution of the House of Representatives, to the betterment of our State, to the future of the Republic. We have been especially consoled during these services by the eloquent remembrances of the leaders he most admired and loved.

Tucked away among the obituary praises, are two items that best describe Gillis' own sentiments. They are his request for a simple military funeral and the notice of his establishment of the Gillis Long Scholarship at Louisiana State University. Distinguished leader, complicated intellectual that he surely was, nonetheless Gillis remained a simple man, loyal to his roots, grateful for his opportunities. He repeatedly gave credit for his education to the free text books made available to Louisiana children by then Governor Huey P. Long and to the GI Bill of Rights that assured his pursuance of the law at L.S.U. He understood as did his friend, my husband Hale, that to be truly great, our State had to open these windows of opportunity to all of its people and often in the early days of the Civil Rights movement he stood valiantly much as Walt Whitman's "Louisiana Live Oak" had "all alone, without any companion, it grew there uttering joyous leaves of dark green."

He was a true son of Louisiana and served her extraordinarily well.

His determination to accomplish what he set out to do was sidetracked only twice when he failed in his election bids for the Governorship. The campaigns, however, only whetted his insatiable appetite for knowledge about the problems and the potential for growth in the State and the betterment of the condition of her people. He transferred his protection and promotion of the interests of Louisiana to the wider national arena of the House of Representatives, knowing as the "Almanac of Politics" observed that "his current district seemed entirely pleased to reelect him indefinitely." Through his position on the Rules Committee, his leadership in the Joint Economic Committee, and especially through the esteem in which he was held by his colleagues, Gillis promoted and protected the energy, the water, the agricultural and forest resources, and expanded the trade and commerce and the research, industrial and technological opportunities for our State. He will be sorely missed.

Wracked by pain and discomfort, as a true Louisianian, Gillis loved life to its fullest expression. Surely now we can publicly admit that he was the captain of the krewe of Louisianians for the Washington, D.C. Mardi Gras Ball. Inveterate traveller, collector of art, eclectic in his taste as an enjoyer of literature, of music, of drama and most especially of the musical "Man from La Mancha," whose theme song has been elevated today into an exquisite requiem by our chivalrous colleague, Walter Fauntroy.

His all time favorite pastime was fishing. Fatigued at times beyond ordinary measure, he was constantly rejuvenated by a fishing trip. As was the Lord Jesus to whose principles he consistently adhered, Gillis was also a "fisher of men" and women. He attracted energetic, talented persons of great worth to the art of politics, then organized, trained, led and inspired them into rendering beneficial service to our Nation, to the Democratic Party and to the institution of the House of Representatives, often as staff members in his own offices. He also possessed the uncanny knack for transforming them into loving personal friends.

Above all else, Gillis was a patriot. He consecrated his considerate talents, his energies, his vast intelligence to the service of our Nation and State, and to the people who had given him the honor of representing them in the Congress.

On the battlefield of war, as the majority leader has reminded us, he won the Bronze Star and was awarded the Purple Heart. And on the battlefield of politics, he gave his "last ounce of courage," to transport all of us beyond "the unreachable stars."

Throughout his quest, he was joined by his family members, his parents, his gallant brother Floyd, by the memory of his dear sister, his precious children, George and Janis (what a joy they provided him and what a rich legacy he has left them!), by literally thousands of avid, loyal supporters, but most especially by his beautiful Cathy, a woman of valor and keen intelligence, greatly loved by all of the rest, and a true professional in her own right.

And now it is time for our weary patriot to be "laid to his rest"; that we release him to the company of the angels as we drum roll our combined tributes into a final salute, and say goodbye to our beloved friend.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentlewoman for her speech.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to Congresswoman OAKAR.

GILLIS LONG: A PRACTICAL VISIONARY

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I want to thank him for taking this special order.

Mr. Speaker, it is with a great sense of loss that I rise to speak about our late colleague, GILLIS LONG of Louisiana.

GILLIS' untimely death has taken from the Nation and Congress a man of unusual vision and understanding. He was a rare leader who knew not only the direction the Nation needed to take but also the steps that needed to be taken to give that direction. He was an activist, goal-oriented visionary.

GILLIS' great strength was that he understood the role of Congress and the Democratic Party in accomplishing the goals he set out for the Nation. He had a unique understanding and appreciation of Congress and the Democratic Party as institutions. His goal was to strengthen those institutions to make them vehicles for bringing about change and providing creative, fresh solutions to America's needs.

In the House, his greatest achievement was in turning the Democratic caucus into an instrument for involving Members and finding new approaches to solving our Nation's problems. GILLIS recognized the party's need to develop and present new ideas.

Moreover, GILLIS understood how crucial it was for a political party to reflect not only its grass roots but also its elected officials. In this sense, he was a very practical visionary. For he wanted the Democratic Party to be able to govern and instill confidence in the American electorate that it had the ability to govern.

If I may inject a personal note, I want to say how greatly I will miss his counsel. I know that my colleagues will also miss it greatly.

On this occasion, it is important that we remember GILLIS by recalling his legacy and committing ourselves to building on the foundation he laid. This would be the most appropriate monument to a great party and congressional leader.

Throughout his career in Congress, GILLIS had his wife, Cathy, working side by side with him. She shared his vision, his compassion and his understanding of how to get things done. Moreover, she knows the people of Louisiana's Eighth Congressional District and their needs. Cathy is uniquely qualified to carry on his work.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I would yield now to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE], who has been patiently waiting, if he would like to be heard at this time.

Mr. PICKLE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, those of us who serve in the House learn quickly the Members who have integrity, who have dedication, who have intelligence, who have character, and we learned many years ago that GILLIS LONG met all of those measurements because he is one of the finest Members we ever had.

GILLIS and I came together in the 88th Congress. I like to recall a little story about GILLIS.

One evening, we were all sitting around and GILLIS LONG started talking about his district. Just like most of us, GILLIS said he had been asked the question: What would you do if you were up for reelection and were defeated? GILLIS responded that he knew exactly what he would do. He said, "I would run again".

Then he added that in spite of all the difficulties of this job, none is more exciting, more challenging. There is recognition and prestige. You meet interesting people from all over the world and there is definitely a sense of making a difference in the lives of your fellow countrymen. He went on to say that he felt he was a natural as a Member of Congress and each day brought new challenges.

The fact of the matter is that GILLIS was not defeated for Congress and he probably never would have been defeated. The Eighth District of Louisiana loved him and his colleagues loved him. The problem is that there are not enough GILLIS LONGS in this country. He was definitely a man of total dedication to the job of representing his constituents.

NOW, GILLIS LONG was a third and fourth cousin in the legendary Long family and in the early days, they did not recognize him as family. According to GILLIS his side of the family was somewhat removed from the famous side.

But his status changed during his days as a public servant at LSU. GILLIS tells the story this way. His roommate was running for LSU student body president and then decided not to run. GILLIS tried his best to convince him to reconsider but the roommate said absolutely not. So, GILLIS at the last moment, decided to run, and much to his surprise he won. The newspapers played up his win with the headline "Another Long Is Elected."

In those days, GILLIS lived in a barracks type dormitory which had one phone in the middle of the long empty hall. Early the next morning after the election he received a phone call at about 6 a.m. GILLIS was summoned to the phone, and as he sleepily picked up the receiver he heard this voice over the other end say "Cousin GILLIS, this is Cousin RUSSELL!" GILLIS knew he was at long last in the family when Senator RUSSELL LONG called.

When GILLIS and Cathy first came to Congress they entered in 1963 with the 88th Congress, which has through the years proved to be the strongest and most active of all the congressional families. Cathy and GILLIS and Beryl and I have spent many happy hours together making plans for the Annual 88th Club St. Patrick's Day Party, and then each year in March seeing these plans turn into one of the most pleasant evenings of the session thanks to our good friend George Koch. Because of the Longs, we can take great pride in knowing that more Members—both former and present—come back to celebrate with us than any in the Congress. The 88th Club has been a close knit, caring group, and GILLIS was one of our most caring and beloved members.

As chairman of the Democratic caucus and as a senior member of the Rules Committee, GILLIS was always there—making a difference.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to our colleague, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUCKABY].

Mr. HUCKABY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I and every other member of the Louisiana delegation have truly lost a dear friend and a great colleague in GILLIS LONG. The State of Louisiana lost one of her most able statesmen and certainly the House of Representatives lost one of its strongest leaders.

As the gentleman from Texas just so eloquently explained, GILLIS LONG broke upon the Louisiana political scene when he became elected as president of the student body at LSU many years ago. We in Louisiana pride ourselves on the fact that we love politics so much. It seems as if we have a statewide election almost every year, and those years in which we do not, we certainly look at who wins the student body presidency of LSU.

I got to know GILLIS first some 20 years ago. GILLIS was running for Governor of Louisiana. My father-in-law was coordinating several of the rural parishes in northern Louisiana for GILLIS, and I can remember riding up and down those country roads putting up tree signs and bumper stickers for GILLIS LONG back then.

GILLIS, even back then, as he was to the very end, and I think he would not object to being referred to as such, was a populist, a man of the people. He prided himself on representing the little people not only of Louisiana but of this Nation.

Although I disagreed with GILLIS philosophically on some issues, I truly admired and respected him. When I came to the House of Representatives some 8 years ago, GILLIS LONG was one of those who took me by the hand, as most Members must have someone do, to show them the ropes, so to speak. GILLIS never failed me when I called upon him.

GILLIS was one of the hardest workers I have ever known. In his total dedication to the people of Louisiana, to his Eighth Congressional District, and to this House of Representatives, GILLIS literally lived and breathed for his job in the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, Louisiana has lost one of its finest sons, and the House has lost one of its most able Members.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I would merely echo the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUCKABY].

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues today in paying tribute to the late Congressman GILLIS LONG. He has served this House and his constituents well.

I am fortunate to have had the pleasure of serving with Mr. LONG on the Joint Economic Committee. He viewed the committee as one for long-range thinking and planning and thus brought with him a unique and valuable perspective.

Representative LONG was also a member of the House Rules Committee. That is an understatement. He was perhaps the key member of the committee on most major issues. He viewed his role on the committee seriously and worked diligently as chairman of the subcommittee on the legislative process.

Mr. LONG also served as chairman of the Democratic caucus. When he took over the chairmanship he immediately set about strengthening the caucus. He is in fact quoted as saying, "I pledged to try to unify the Democratic Members of the House." He was determined to set up discussions in the caucus about the role of the Democratic Party in future national politics. His attitude was admirable and we will try to carry on the dream GILLIS LONG had about the important part the caucus can play in our political system.

GILLIS LONG represented his district with integrity and wisdom. He embraced the needs of teachers, farmers, environmentalists, organized labor and consumers alike and worked diligently to ensure their voices would be heard and their needs addressed. I am sure that they, as well as we his colleagues will miss him. However, I am sure that we have all benefited from his knowledge and his dedication and he will not be forgotten.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. TAUZIN].

Mr. TAUZIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAUX], for taking this special order in honor of our dear colleague, GILLIS LONG.

Those who attended the beautiful services in Alexandria—and there were a hundred Members of this body and staff who came in such a fitting tribute to GILLIS—were blessed to hear some of the most eloquent eulogies I think I have ever heard in my young life—to hear Speaker O'NEILL, to hear the soaring eloquence of House Majority Leader JIM WRIGHT, the tremendous, compassionate eloquence of CLAUDE PEPPER, the soaring rendition of "The Impossible Dream" by our colleague, WALTER FAUNTROY, that will haunt us forever as we remember GILLIS, and the magnificence of our first lady in Louisiana, LINDY BOGGS, when she brought us back from all that soaring rhetoric and focused our attention on that simple coffin that contained the remains of GILLIS and reminded us that for all the tremendous work that GILLIS did and for all his complex intellectualism, he was, most importantly, a simple man, a man who remembered his roots and a man for whom the most important persons in his life were those with whom he worked and those he served.

GILLIS, in all those eulogies and in my mind and in the minds of most of us who serve in this body, will be most remembered as a decent man of great and fixed convictions. It is not secret that GILLIS' political career was grossly interrupted because he in Louisiana took a stand for civil rights when it was then unpopular to do so, because he in this body, as a member of the Rules Committee, made it possible for this Nation to advance the cause of civil rights when it was then unpopular at home. GILLIS paid a dear political price for taking that stand and for standing by his convictions.

When I think of those days, I am reminded of the words of Rudyard Kipling in "Gunga Din" when he said, "By the livin' Gawd that made you, You're a better man than I am, Gunga Din."

That is GILLIS LONG. Because of GILLIS, Louisiana is a much more tolerant place, a place where civil rights are again respected, and this Nation is a much more tolerant Nation because this one man of conviction indeed stood tall.

There is a phrase used in legislative circles to describe a very kind legislator. It is called "a man of the House." Many of us come to this body and work in other legislatures with the intent of serving the folks back home exclusively. We make that our prime and almost unique and sole occupation. Others, while fulfilling that function, also seek to establish themselves within this House as a leader, as one who understands the rules and makes it work and makes things happen and helps build this institution. There are quite a number of those here in this room today who, like GILLIS LONG, work to build the institution of this House and continue to improve it. GILLIS was one of those; he was one of the foremost of those who presently serve.

In fact, the life of GILLIS LONG in many respects parallels that of our great departed colleague, Hale Boggs. Hale was also a "man of the House," one who dedicated himself to improve this institution and, like GILLIS, left an indelible mark upon it. And like Hale Boggs, GILLIS was blessed to have with him a soulmate, a friend, a sponsor, and a supporter in the likes of Cathy Long, just as Hale was blessed to have our dean LINDY BOGGS to help him through it all. Like LINDY, I hope and pray that Cathy may join us here and continue the work of GILLIS in this House, because for many years she has worked for us and beside us as an able right hand to GILLIS LONG.

GILLIS was a consummate politician. He loved politics and was proud to be a politician. You may recall that in the great Kennedy volume, "Profiles in Courage," John Kennedy spoke to that and how important it was that we in America began to understand that the word, "politician," is indeed a good and honest and decent word. As House leader JIM WRIGHT pointed out, it can be a clean and honorable profession if only we make it so. GILLIS loved the profession and was a consummate politician.

My colleague, JOHN BREAUX, often joked that, when visiting GILLIS' office one day, he leaned on one of GILLIS' phones and raised enough money to run his campaign that year.

GILLIS was always campaigning and delving in State politics. In fact, it is no secret that when GILLIS lost his chance to serve Louisiana as its Governor and Louisiana lost the service of GILLIS as its Governor by a thin margin, GILLIS nevertheless made the difference in determining who would be the next Governor and who would be the next Senator, both of whom now serve our State in those capacities. GILLIS loved politics, and he loved this House.

We remember GILLIS also in a personal way. GILLIS was a deeply devoted friend to every one of us. I recall that GILLIS very carefully took new Members under his wing, and I was one of them. I recall visiting GILLIS in the middle of the night in New Orleans in his hotel room to seek his advice on entering the race for this Congress in 1980. I recall GILLIS waking to greet me in his pajamas and spending about an hour and a half with me in the middle of the night to discuss with me that opportunity that I had. GILLIS ultimately told me I did not have much of a chance, but he also committed himself to do everything in his power to help me. It is that kind of personal remembrance of GILLIS that sticks with so many of us in Louisiana, because GILLIS was that loyal and that much of a friend.

But GILLIS' primary loyalty, I believe, was most of all to human decency itself. His legacy is a Nation that is much more just than the way he found it. GILLIS LONG was a great American leader. He believed in government of, by, and for the people, and he put the emphasis on government for the people.

In his beautiful ceremony in Alexandria, the Reverend Lynn P. Clayton tried to comfort us in his leaving. Reverend Clayton told the story about a young boy who was facing death at an early age, a death that his father and mother were well aware was coming, and his father dreaded the day, of course, when his son would ask him that terrible question about what death was all about. But that day came, and the son approached his father and asked him what it was like to die, and the father had prepared, as Reverend Clayton said, a very tender response. I would like to leave you with that father's response, as given to us by Reverend Clayton.

The father said to his son:

Son, when you come home tired and exhausted and your body is ready for sleep and you fall upon the couch and you go to sleep and you wake up in the morning and you are in your bedroom in your comfortable bed, do you know how you got from the couch to your bed?

And the little boy said:

Well, sure, daddy, you carried me to bed.

And the father said:

Well, son, that is what dying is all about. We fall asleep, and someone, the Almighty, carries us from that place where we fall asleep to a much better home, a more comfortable home, a home that we have earned by loving one another here on Earth.

Mr. Speaker, GILLIS earned his home. We regret his leaving, but we also rejoice in that he has earned his reward.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. LEVIN of Michigan]. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAUX] has expired.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be recognized at this time for 1 hour to proceed with my special order on our late colleague, GILLIS LONG.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

A TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HONORABLE GILLIS W. LONG

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUCKABY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SEIBERLING].

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for yielding, and I thank him and the other members of the Louisiana delegation for taking this time. I wish to join with them in commemorating our beloved late former colleague, GILLIS LONG.

1240

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. COELHO].

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the Louisiana delegation has taken this time to honor a gentleman that meant a lot to my wife, Phyllis, and I.

GILLIS LONG is the type of individual that we talk about a lot, the type of individual that can bridge all differences, an individual who can bring people from different points of view together to discuss, and hopefully to resolve a particular issue.

GILLIS believed in communication and believed in people talking and trying to resolve problems.

GILLIS was a politician's politician. He loved politics. He loved this House. He loved the institution and he loved legislation, but he was the complete legislator that we so often do not have, someone who liked every aspect of this job, someone who took new people who came into this institution and encouraged them to use everything at their disposal to get involved and to make a difference.

The greatest compliment that any of us can have said about us is that regardless of how much time we spend in this particular institution, that we have made a difference. GILLIS LONG made a difference. He made a difference for this institution. He obviously made a difference for Louisiana, but he made a difference for a lot of us individually and personally.

For that we thank him. He now has his just reward.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished dean of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN].

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I was privileged to serve with GILLIS LONG throughout his service here. Our relationship was very, very close and I concur in all the nice things that have been said here today.

Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in expressing my deep regret over the untimely passing of our good friend, GILLIS LONG of Louisiana.

GILLIS was not only a friend and excellent Congressman, but also a fine man whose integrity was never questioned. His record in Congress is one that all Members could emulate—steady, steadfast, a partisan in the finest sense of the word but fair to the opposition.

We shall all miss him. To his wife and family, we extend our sincere sympathy.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BEVILL].

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend and colleague from Louisiana for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives and the Nation lost a great leader and dedicated American with the sudden passing of our good friend, GILLIS LONG.

GILLIS was a man of thought and action who gave his utmost to serve the people he represented. He completely understood the role of a U.S. Representative and he provided his constituents with the highest caliber of service. In addition, GILLIS was a rich source of leadership for his party and his colleagues in Congress, but always with the chief goal of improving our Nation.

GILLIS was instrumental in helping to develop a new agenda for our Nation. Through his inspiring leadership, the statement of the Democratic caucus, "rebuilding the road to opportunity," helped to point a new way for America. GILLIS provided the spark and the fuel for this tremendous undertaking.

GILLIS LONG understood the workings of Congress and helped to make the system produce legislation which is, today, making important contributions to bettering the lives of millions of Americans. In addition to his years as a Member of the House, his knowledge of Congress came, in part, from his service on the staffs of several committees in the House and Senate. GILLIS used his vast experience and his breadth of understanding the role of Government to develop programs and legislation which solved problems. Of all the men and women who have served in Congress, GILLIS is among the very few who have been masters of the legislative process.

Our thoughts are with his family. GILLIS and his lovely wife, Cathy, have been close friends of ours. Together with Cathy and the children, we share their grief and deep loss. But we also realize that GILLIS' life was rich and contributed greatly to making this a better land for all Americans. His absence from the House will make it less joyful. But his many contributions of the past have made our Nation far richer. We will miss him deeply.

I hope that Cathy will decide to seek this office and continue the very outstanding work for our Nation that GILLIS did.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'BRIEN].

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, when one considers quality as being a measure of this distinguished body, one would have to recognize that GILLIS LONG helped the average and we are reduced by virtue of his loss.

Mr. Speaker, the sudden and untimely death of our friend and colleague, GILLIS LONG, means the Members of this House have lost a valuable companion and a powerful legislator.

GILLIS LONG exhibited political savvy as chairman of the Democratic caucus and as a senior member of the Rules Committee. His influence went much further than the Halls of this body, however, as witnessed by his deep interest in seeing improvement in our economic relations with our trading partners in the Far East.

It is indeed sad and ironic that GILLIS LONG was unable to assume the duties of the chairmanship of the Joint Economic Committee, to which he was only recently elected, and carry that interest further.

My wife Mary Lou joins me in expressing to his widow, Cathy, our deepest sympathy.

The widely diverse Eighth Congressional District of Louisiana, which extends from piney woods in the north to the Cajun country in the south, has lost an exceptional Representative: astute, conscientious, even tempered, and caring.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GIBBONS].

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I have been privileged to sit here and listen to these wonderful tributes to GILLIS LONG and some of them have been the best tributes I have ever heard. It is because of the fact that GILLIS LONG was one of the best Members that ever served in this Congress.

I was privileged to come to Congress in 1963 with GILLIS LONG and with Cathy and Martha and I got to know them shortly after arriving here. We were just an ordinary run of the mill new freshman class here, but GILLIS LONG and Cathy and JAKE PICKLE and some of the others were able to weld us together in being a very effective political group, but certainly a very homogeneous group of friends.

It is with that thought that I want to make some comments today. GILLIS, as so many have said, was the ultimate of good politicians. He was highly motivated. He was very dedicated and very skillful at it.

After serving his first year here, he decided to run for Governor and unfortunately did not make it and was prevented from coming back to Congress for a while; but he returned during the Johnson administration to work with Sargent Shriver on the Economic Opportunity Act. It is probably not a widely known fact, but GILLIS probably had as much influence on that as any other person who was ever connected with that program, with the possible exception of Sargent Shriver.

GILLIS dedicated his skills and his goals to providing better economic opportunities for all Americans in this country and with his legislative skill was able to push that program through Congress and to nurture it for a number of years. He then returned to Congress and shortly took over again as a leader and as a fine friend.

GILLIS moved rapidly in the power structure of this body, not so much from his personal ambition, but from his high skill and his great integrity. Under all of that, he was always a great personal friend to each of us.

I know when I would have legislative problems and would seek expert advice, the first person I always went to and the best advice I always got was from GILLIS Long. He could tell you how to solve the problem or whether there was a chance of solving that problem or not.

He was a leader because he loved people. He was a leader because he loved to serve in this body and he was so able and adequately supported by his very fine wife, Cathy.

Martha and I have never lost a closer friend in this Congress than GILLIS LONG. We pray that he is on the other side in a peaceful condition, because he has fought the good fight and done the best with the God-given gifts that any of us have.

I hope that his family, and particularly Cathy, have received their appropriate condolences in all of this, because I know how much Cathy particularly dedicated her life to working with GILLIS and his service to the people of Louisiana and his service to all of the people in this country.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOYER] such time as he may consume.

Mr. HOYER. I thank the gentleman from Louisiana for yielding this time and I thank the Louisiana delegation for taking this time to allow all of us to pay tribute to one of the great individuals who has ever served in this body, the people's House.

On Inauguration Day, which in so many ways is a new beginning with new possibilities, it was with great sorrow that I and others in this body learned of the death of our friend and colleague, GILLIS LONG. For many of us in the House, GILLIS LONG was a mentor.

I follow SAM GIBBONS who came to Congress in 1962 or 1963 with GILLIS LONG. There are many of us who came some 20 years later to serve with GILLIS LONG, we who he reached out to, who he instructed, and who he made feel at home in this body.

Although he was definitely a part of the leadership, he repeatedly sought to involve those of us, the newer Members, in the legislative process.

In the past 4 years as chairman of the Democratic caucus he had been leading our party carefully toward a new identity. If the House is seen today as a center of new ideas and new leadership, and I think increasingly that is the case, then one of those we have to thank is GILLIS LONG. He revitalized the Democratic caucus to make it a forum in which most Members now participate.

The two documents issued by the caucus, "Rebuilding the Road to Opportunity," and "Renewing America's Promise," would not have been written if it were not for the leadership and dedication of our friend, GILLIS LONG.

As a member of the committee, I know that GILLIS LONG contributed much to my perception of the direction in which our party should go.

GILLIS LONG, a son of the best known political family in the State of Louisiana, had a long and distinguished record of public service. A decorated veteran of World War II, he went on to complete his undergraduate work and to get his law degree. For several years he worked in Washington as counsel to the Senate Committee on Small Business and the special House Committee on Campaign Expenditures.

In 1962, as has been related, he was elected to the Congress. In a tough battle for reelection, GILLIS LONG stood on principle. GILLIS LONG was an example to everyone who seeks public office, to everyone who is confronted with the opportunity to stand on principle or retreat from commitments because of political opportunism. GILLIS LONG showed the courage that made this democracy great, and that made him great. We can all learn from the courage that GILLIS LONG showed in the face of defeat.

We were, of course, all fortunate that, some 8 years later, in 1972 the voters of Louisiana's Eighth Congressional District, finally voted to return GILLIS LONG to the House. In his six terms he became a leader in so many ways. His influence extended across the spectrum of our party to Members of every region. That is why you see Members of every region, every ideological persuasion, every age group, coming here to speak of our beloved colleague GILLIS LONG.

In economic matters and in matters of procedure in the House he was a leader, an expert.

Although I speak here today in memory of GILLIS LONG, I shall always be thankful that I took the opportunity on January 3, to dictate a letter to him. That letter was typed on January 3, and I had the foresight to have it hand-delivered on the morning of January 4. I would like to read just a brief portion of that letter:

DEAR GILLIS: As we begin a new year and you conclude your service as Chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, I want to take this opportunity to express to you my sincerest thanks.

Gillis, you, more than any other single Member of the Congress, have provided me with opportunities to participate in a meaningful way in the workings of the House. I will never forget your taking the time to discuss with me personally my interests and ambitions.

As I know that was true for STENY HOYER, I know that it was true for literally 100 young Members who came to this House in the last three sessions.

I went on to say in that letter:

Gillis, I cannot stress how keenly I feel about your leadership in involving the younger Members of the House in the formulation of party policy and the improving of Caucus rules. In addition, your leadership in the Democratic Party and your role in enhancing the participation not only of Members of the House but of all elected officials is an inestimable contribution to the redirecting and strengthening of our party. The moderation and stability that such inclusion has brought and will bring in the future is in my opinion one of the most significant reforms that could have been effected to make us once again a national party. There is literally no other Member of the House who has played as sensitive and effective role as you have over the last four years.

In closing, I want to reiterate how appreciative I am of the Opportunities that you extended to me. Without your advice, friendship, and inclusive action, I know that I would not have been able to become involved in a meaningful way in the business of the Caucus as quickly as I did. For that I thank you very, very much.

Then I closed and delivered this letter to him on the 4th of January:

Looking forward to serving many years with you in the House and with warmest regards to you and Cathy, I am sincerely yours.

That letter was delivered to GILLIS on the morning of the 4th, and on the afternoon of the 4th, GILLIS came over to me, had read the letter, and thanked me.

As BILLY TAUZIN has mentioned earlier, almost 100 of us went to Alexandria, LA, to pay a tribute, not the last tribute we will pay, but a tribute at the funeral of GILLIS LONG. Cathy Long had read this letter and thanked me for it. I am so pleased that I have this opportunity to express for the record, for Cathy, for the family, for the people of Louisiana, and for the people of this Nation a tribute to a great American, a great human being, a caring and loving individual. I will be ever thankful that I took the opportunity to thank GILLIS LONG a few days before God took him.

GILLIS LONG was a great friend to us all.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. HUCKABY. At this time I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER].

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, I guess one never knows how deeply an individual affects one until death. I was driving to the LaGuardia Airport from my home in Brooklyn on the morning of January 4 and, as I usually do, I turned on the radio and I listened to the CBS 8 o'clock news broadcast which is a 15-minute broadcast. I was listening to the news, anticipating Inauguration Day down here with a happy heart.

At 8:15, the radio announcer said, in one sentence: "Last story, and last night Representative GILLIS LONG of Louisiana died."

Instantaneously, I knew that I had suffered a loss. The day before, I might not have realized the loss that I had suffered. But I could not continue driving any longer and pulled over to the side of the road just to catch my thoughts and my breath, and thought about all of the things that GILLIS had done, as STENY HOYER had said, not only for me, but for so many of the younger Members of the House.

I could tell you 10 stories about how GILLIS helped me personally with my growth, with my learning about this process, with my learning respect for an individual from a completely different part of the country and different background than mine.

I will tell just one because I think it is representative: In August 1983, I had a brainy idea to have a debate among the Presidential candidates—the eight Democratic Presidential candidates—and one of the first people I went to, just to bounce the idea around with, as I customarily did, was GILLIS.

GILLIS said it was a great idea. He thought the party ought to be open to everybody; he thought the availability of the candidates as we had seen them in our Democratic caucus ought to be there for every Democrat across the country.

He said, "Why don't you circulate a letter and try to get people to sign?"

I did, and 100 of our colleagues signed. The debate was scheduled and GILLIS had done it under the auspices of the caucus.

Well, in about November, a number of the Presidential candidates got cold feet. They did not want to debate. They thought it would give the people way back in the pack a chance for the same national exposure that they had, and they began to say, "Let's not have a debate."

They first went and talked to me, and I said, "Well, the debate is planned. How can we call it off?"

Then they went and talked to GILLIS.

After each call that GILLIS received from every powerful figure in the entire Democratic Party, GILLIS came over to me and he said, "Look, whether this debate goes on or not is not going to be of great national consequence to our party. But I told you back in August when it seemed like a good idea that I would back you up. I will continue to back you up. I will tell every one of those figures who might be President of the country one day that if CHUCK SCHUMER wants to have the debate, we are going to have the debate."

And furthermore, he told them that he wanted the debate and that even if they should manage to get me to change it, he was going to make sure that the debate was carried off.

Throughout that process, GILLIS was there being a shield, not getting any of the glory or any of the credit, but just being a shield. That was the kind of a person GILLIS was; he cared about integrity, he cared about commitment, he cared about friendship, he cared about the underdog, and he would look figures straight in the eye.

That was GILLIS LONG. Let him be a beacon. Every time each of us is swerved by the political vicissitudes which naturally affect our great profession, let us think of GILLIS LONG, let us think of his integrity, let us think of how the losses he suffered made him a greater person to his family, to his party, to his State, and to America.

GILLIS, I will miss you.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCURDY].

Mr. MCCURDY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the mark, the ultimate tribute, I think, to any person, and I know to a lot of senior citizens in this country and a lot of traditional families, has been to have all those grandchildren sitting at a grandparent's knee and to see the family and to be able to reflect upon the accomplishments of the family.

Well, I do not know if GILLIS ever had the opportunity of having grandchildren but as you look out across this Chamber, and if you look at the people who have proceeded to the well this afternoon, I think you will find that there are a lot of us who consider GILLIS almost as a father or grandfather because he reached out to the young members of the Democratic Party, to the young Members of Congress, and he provided a strength that very few Members of Congress have been able to provide or to give to other Members.

Former President Truman once said that the mark of a real leader is the development of new leaders. I think GILLIS LONG was a true leader.

He was able to work with younger Members of Congress, to help develop the potential for greater things in the future. He knew the strains the party and especially this institution were under during the last few years, and was able to act as a magnet and bring together people from various backgrounds and ideologies, to focus the debate and the views in one central point.

As a member of the Committee for Party Effectiveness that GILLIS founded and chaired for so long, I join my colleagues, especially the younger Members, in paying what we consider to be a very important tribute. GILLIS was a true leader.

STENY HOYER probably said it as well as I have ever heard it said, and he did have the foresight, and I think a number of us are always jealous of the person who can look ahead and write a letter to GILLIS and exchange those compliments and the feelings that he had; and I, too, had the opportunity of, just before the inauguration, visiting with GILLIS. I had gone through a very intense struggle in this institution in this very caucus. GILLIS LONG helped me very much.

I think the comment that we had and the conversation that we had during that entire episode provided some extra strength and courage to me.

So, as a young Member of Congress who hopes to be around this institution for a while, I think that I can join, honestly, with a great number of my colleagues in saying that we are going to miss GILLIS very much.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I would yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN].

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, there is truly something special occurring here. A good number of us are rising to say something that we feel with true depth.

Like others in the freshman class of 2 years ago, I only knew GILLIS for a couple of years; too short, far too short a time. But it was long enough to come to admire GILLIS and really to love him.

I had the privilege of sitting on this Party Effectiveness Committee that GILLIS chaired, the weekly lunches. He used that as an arena for involvement. GILLIS talked about participatory democracy as if he had invented the term. No, he had not invented it. He, at the least, reinvented it and made it come to a reality within the House and certainly on the Democratic side.

He had a way of reaching out, bringing in. I am not sure where it came from; perhaps it came from his experience of losing several contests; but one thing was so true of GILLIS LONG that maybe he lost several battles but he was never, never defeated.

GILLIS LONG never gave up and I think for those of us who knew him, we realized that the only thing that could still GILLIS was death—but not fully, because I really think that when we stand up here and say that his memory lives on, that we are dedicated to making that happen.

□ 1310

And so with many others, I send to Cathy and the rest of the family, to the children and others, our condolences, but we also give our condolences to the Nation. GILLIS was not a "household name" throughout the Nation, but what he stood for was important for every household in America.

He did pass away too young, much too young. For all of us who have stood in the well here today, we pledge that we will carry on his work, participatory democracy will become, through his memory, through his works, and through our remembering his memory indeed a household term throughout the United States of America.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. BREAUX]. The gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. COLLINS].

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, like all those who have stood in this well, paying tribute to GILLIS, I certainly did not want the day to go by without giving my personal expressison of the great loss that I feel for GILLIS LONG.

Just a couple of weeks ago, I was on a study mission with the Rules Committee and during that time there was a lot of discussion about GILLIS LONG, how everybody felt about him, and what a great guy he was. I was so proud that everybody that I was working with on that particular mission felt the same way about GILLIS that I did.

You can imagine how surprised I was less than a week later to find myself along with other Members, going to GILLIS' funeral.

When I first came to Congress, in 1973, I did not know a soul except some of my husband's friends who were here. I remember sitting one day in this Chamber, sort of alone and by myself, when a man came over to me. I did not know what his name was at that time because it is hard to know who 434 other people are all at once; but this man came over to me and said "How are you doing?" I said "I'm doing fine." He said, "My name is GILLIS LONG. If there is ever anything I can do to help you, just let me know." He said, "This is sometimes a hard place to get used to, but I think you'll make it."

It was that encouraging remark that made me feel that I was becoming a part of this great body. Well, as all those years went past, I got to know GILLIS much better and I found that he was a person I could go to when I had a problem, when I had a question, when there was anything I didn't really understand.

He always had a willing smile and he always gave great thought to the questions I asked of him; it was not a passing thing with him; he took the question seriously. He would call back and say, "Cardiss, I have thought about your question and perhaps you might want to be guided in this direction or that" and so forth.

I find that is something I am really going to miss a very great deal. I can remember just a little over a year ago, I was faced with a very serious primary election in my district. I went to GILLIS and told him, "GILLIS, I need some new ideas on the way that I can help myself get back to Congress, which is a body that I love and want to continue to serve in." And he was right there.

Election night, when everybody else was asleep and everybody was talking about all the other elections that were going on in the country, I got a phone call. The phone call was from GILLIS LONG. He said, "How is the election coming?" I said, GILLIS, I do not know; it is just too soon to tell."

The next morning my office tells me that I got another call, and it was a call from GILLIS LONG, and they told him that I had won. And my secretary told me that she could hear the joy and happiness in this man's voice.

That is a true friend, one who was concerned about the Members of the House of Representatives. I am sure that every Member here can tell you how GILLIS touched their lives. I will surely miss GILLIS, he was a friend.

As Chairman of the Democratic caucus, GILLIS served his party well. He placed a premium on unity and new ideas. Only a statesman with the fine political skills of GILLIS LONG could have held together as diverse a coalition as the Democratic Party. His advocacy of new ideas led to the development of a blueprint for the party's future entitled "Rebuilding the Road to Opportunity." This document stands as a valuable guide in these difficult times.

As a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, I am particularly aware and appreciative of GILLIS' fine civil rights record. Back in his first term in the early 1960's, he voted to unblock stalled civil rights legislation by enlarging the Rules Committee. Many believe that this courageous vote was responsible for his defeat in 1964 when his opponent used it as the major issue in the election. He refused to renounce his convictions when confronted with bigotry and racism.

That is the way GILLIS was. He stood up for what he believed to be right. I'm a better Member of this House because of him. Let me say in closing that so many times we have acquaintances and buddies and pals, but friendship is something that all too few of us recognize for the rewards that are associated. I am proud that GILLIS was my friend and I had a chance to cross his path.

To his dear wife Cathy I want to say that just over 12 years ago I stood in her shoes. I want her to know that my heart goes out to her and that my family sends our condolences.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL].

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is quite a surprise to me and probably everyone else that I am in this Chamber. I had not been involved in politics, and certainly no one ever expected me to be here speaking to you today; but I have had several shocks as I have come to this Chamber.

One of those great shocks is the tremendous quality of the people that serve herein. I go back to my district and people talk about how terrible the Congress is and so on. I am here to tell everyone that in all my life, I have never served or been involved with such a great group of people as we have here. GILLIS is one of those people, as are others; I served with him on the group working on party effectiveness.

One of the things that we do as we go through life is we learn of the mistakes that we have made. I made a mistake for which I feel very sorry; I never told GILLIS how much I thought of him, and now I cannot; it is too late.

I hope that I will not make that mistake with others in this Chamber whom I feel are so great; some of whom are sitting right here in this room.

I had another disappointment, and that is that GILLIS was a great fisherman, and we talked about it time and time again, about how we were going to go fishing, but we never did, and now it is too late.

But it is not too late to stand here and let Cathy know what a wonderful person that I think GILLIS was, and how much he meant to me as he meant to others.

I say time and time again that the most important thing that we can do in all of our lives is to live our lives in such a manner that we set an example for others which they will want to follow, and that that is more important than all the honors that we may receive. For me, GILLIS was such a person.

I thank God that I had the opportunity to serve with him and know him, and I am sure I speak not just for myself but for others as well when I say that we are deeply appreciative for that tremendous opportunity, and wish his wife Cathy and family the best of everything and hope they realize how much GILLIS meant to the rest of us.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WHEAT].

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply saddened at the passing of our friend and colleague, GILLIS LONG. His death marks not only a personal loss for me and other Members of this body, but it represents a loss for the country, as well.

Last week, I attended the funeral service for GILLIS. While there, I listened as people paid tribute to a man with whom I had had the honor to work closely. Numerous Members of this body attended the service. The distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee spoke, my colleague from the District of Columbia sang, the Speaker of the House of Representatives paid tribute and elected officials from all over the State of Louisiana, including the Governor, came to pay their last respects to this great man. I must say I was very impressed that so many elected officials would come out to pay their final respects.

But what moved me most was not the turnout of the more celebrated citizens of Louisiana, but of those who are less well known. People from all walks of life, rich and poor, black and white, the famous and the not so famous, all came to pay their respects to a man who had served them all and served them equally.

As I sat and I watched the mourners come to comfort the family, the book of John, chapter 15, verse 13: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" kept running through my mind.

I thought about GILLIS and I thought about what I most admired about him and this verse kept coming back to mind. Truly, GILLIS was a Member who had laid down his life for his friends and constituents. He had dedicated his life to serving them.

In the late fifties and early sixties, this country was in the midst of a great transition. I was a child but even so, I recognized the significance of what was occurring in our Nation. I knew that people were fighting for rights which were granted by the Constitution but denied them by fellow countrymen.

In the Halls of this building and on the floor of this Chamber, Members were debating about passage of legislation which would rectify this injustice. As we know, sometimes in this body, battles are not only fought and won on the floor, but also in committees.

The committee on which I currently serve, and on which GILLIS so ably served, was the scene of one of the battles. For some time, the President wanted to pass a civil rights bill to give all Americans equal rights but his efforts were being resisted by several Members of the Rules Committee, including its chairman, Howard Smith. It was decided that the only way to get the legislation considered would be to expand the membership of the Rules Committee. In 1961, a vote to enlarge the Rules Committee for the 87th Congress was passed. In 1963, another vote regarding the enlargement of the committee was taken. The 1963 vote would make enlargement of the Rules Committee permanent.

Needless to say, the decision to permanently enlarge the Rules Committee was not well received by Members from districts which bitterly opposed enactment of civil rights legislation. They were disturbed because they knew that committee enlargement meant that sooner or later, the House would have to consider civil rights legislation.

I can only imagine the dilemma with which GILLIS, a freshman, found himself confronted. Many of his constituents opposed civil rights legislation. Should he do the politically safe thing and vote against enlarging the committee or should he take a course of action which he personally felt was best—a course of action which would significantly improve this country but an action that could possibly damage his career?

I am honored to say that GILLIS followed his convictions and voted to expand the size of the Rules Committee. The results of his vote, along with the votes of other courageous Members, made consideration and passage of civil rights legislation possible.

GILLIS LONG, however, paid a price for following his convictions. He lost his 1964 bid for reelection to the House of Representatives. He lost because he took a politically, unpopular stance but the right stand. GILLIS opened doors for many who had been previously denied their constitutional rights but seemingly, he had closed the door on a promising career.

I don't know if GILLIS will ever realize what his sacrifice meant to people from his district who couldn't vote at the time, people who had no political voice. But I know. I saw it last week at a Baptist Church in Alexandria, LA, in the eyes of men and women who remembered all that he had done for them and who came to pay their last respects.

It was an honor to work with such a great man, so early in my political career. I only hope that we all follow the example that he set.

□ 1320

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MACKAY].

Mr. MACKAY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, we all mourn the loss of GILLIS LONG. Most Members of the House had the privilege of knowing GILLIS for a longer period of time than I, but few could admire, respect, or appreciate him more.

As one of the freshman Members of the House in the 98th Congress, struggling to become participants rather than observers in the process, GILLIS LONG was the first to reach out to us. From the first day, he took us seriously. He was the first to give us a forum and he consistently served as a bridge between our freshman group and the leadership of the House and of our party.

GILLIS had many strengths, but many of us think his greatest strength may have been his ability to reach out to all groups, both within the House and in our society at large. That ability, coupled with a keen ability to recognize what is right and pursue it without consideration of the consequences, serves as a role model for those of us who share a commitment to the House of Representatives as an institution.

As a fellow southerner, I can appreciate how difficult his views on social issues and civil rights were at the time he first championed them. His pioneering such causes helped to mold the "new South" and help clear the way today for more socially conscious elected officials from the South.

It is common to say to a colleague who has helped us: "Thanks, I owe you one." Like many others, I have had occasion to say that to GILLIS.

The truth is, all of us "owe one" to GILLIS LONG. We owe him a commitment to be guided by the same principles which led him. If we can fulfill that commitment, the Congress will be a better place for it—and this country will be a better place for it.

Mr. HUCKABY. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALGREN].

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say as simply as I can how much we in the Congress, will miss GILLIS LONG, how much we respected him as a Member of the Congress of the United States, and how much we liked him as a person.

It is hard to know what to say about a life. In many ways the specific things that make up history pass as life moves on and are not recalled. In many ways here in the Congress it is someone's personal characteristics that are most appreciated from day to day. And of course that is lost as time passes.

Looking back in GILLIS' time here, as others have mentioned, there are a number of things that stand out that should be noted and should be remembered. Two things especially strike me.

The first, was his courage on civil rights issues long before the civil rights issue captured our Nation's attention and became the pivotal social crisis of our time. GILLIS' position was courageous. But, as we look back, it also could best be described as "wise."

GILLIS reflected real wisdom in understanding the change in race relations that all our values and goals as a Nation required. Although he lost an election over it, to me, his position reflected real wisdom about human nature. In the process, he set an example that will make better Members of Congress out of us who follow him.

The second major political event I recall in the time I knew GILLIS has to do with the governorship of Louisiana. GILLIS spent his life involved in Louisiana politics on a level that gave him every reason to run for governor several years ago. That had been his goal for many years. It was within his reach. But he decided to stay in the U.S. Congress. To me that reflects again a sense of wisdom, a recognition of the validity and critical role the Congress plays for our democracy. GILLIS recognized that, even though we are often frustrated by the reality that Congress acts as a "committee" in which the individual is often last, the Congress is the heartbeat of our democracy and the base of the strength of our country.

GILLIS recognized that the time and energy be spent on the Congress was well spent by any human being.

To me that reveals an underlying appreciation of the value of the U.S. Congress, of the importance of its contribution to our whole fabric of life. Others will look to his example and will serve better because of it. And the Congress will be better because of GILLIS' commitment to it.

GILLIS has left an inestimable footprint on the life of the country. My boy will be better for his service. And, from his own vantage point, I think GILLIS would think that his service here was very worthwhile indeed.

I think we should also note that no political effort can be larger than its base, and the base in this case was an equal product of his wife, Cathy, who worked along with him in the development and the maintenance of the political support that kept GILLIS here and able to be here, and in that sense she has every right to be as proud of his contribution as GILLIS himself would be.

So thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the opportunity to join in these remarks.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. KAPTUR].

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, last week, this body lost one of its most able, understanding, and "democratic" Members. GILLIS LONG, a man of character and leadership, belonged in this House of Representatives. He believed in this institution's potential and he tried to make it a more responsive and effective body. Many of my colleagues knew GILLIS much longer than I did. But his presence left its impact especially on the relative newcomers like myself.

For the then freshman Members like myself who came here first in 1983, GILLIS LONG helped smooth out a rough road. He helped build and educate newcomers. He gave guidance, good advice, and respect. Though he came from a vastly different part of the country than I do, he understood me and my constituents—because he understood this institution and the American people.

By appointing a broad spectrum of Members to the Committee on Party Effectiveness, GILLIS gave many of us a special opportunity to shape the future of our party and its legislative agenda. As a freshman, this experience was invaluable. For that, and for so many other things he did, I will be forever grateful to GILLIS LONG, my colleague and my friend.

As we move forward with the business of the 99th Congress, let us all remember, Democrat and Republican, the gentleman from Louisiana who displayed such fairness, dedication of purpose, and the belief in the collective judgment of this institution and the American people it represents.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE].

Mr. LEVINE of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as a Member of the 98th class, I have been privileged to serve in this House for the past 2 years. During that time I found GILLIS LONG to be perhaps as sensitive, thoughtful and sympathetic a friend as I could have sought from any part of this country and in any part of this body.

GILLIS LONG, not only belonged to this body, but he made each of us believe that we belonged here as well.

It was GILLIS LONG who brought together a broad cross-section of Members every week, frequently twice a week, in an organization which was run in fact by participating Members, rather than dominated in any significant extent by the legislative staff. And nobody gave more to that organization and nobody gave more to this body than did GILLIS LONG. He not only made time for issues, for creative thought and for broad-based legislative solutions that would appeal to all regions of the country, but he also made time for every other person here.

For those who have not had the privilege of serving in this Congress, and particularly for those who perhaps have served in smaller legislative bodies, such as the State legislature from which I came, one does not understand how difficult it is for humanity to inject itself in an arena such as this. This body is made up of 435 people, and it is rare for one individual to take the time to make it more human. By doing so, he makes the product broader, firmer, much more likely to succeed; he ensures that the results that he is seeking are much more likely to be effective; and he ensures that each individual Member feels a stake in the process by participating directly.

I feel a sense of incredible loss with GILLIS' passing. I felt that GILLIS' funeral last week was one of the few funerals that I ever attended which really provided a sense of the depth and thoughtfulness of humanity of the human being who had passed. I believe that all of those thoughts and memories not only from last week but from my experience the past 2 years are among the most important that I will share and maintain for however long I am privileged to serve in this body. I am proud to be able to have called GILLIS LONG a friend. He will remain in my memory for a lifetime.

● Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in tribute to one of our body's most distinguished and farsighted Members, Representative GILLIS LONG, whose passing last week was a shock to us all.

GILLIS was a man who carved his own distinctive road in our institution. As a youthful Member of Congress from Louisiana in the early 1960's, he had the courage to support the expansion of the membership of the House Rules Committee, which made possible the passage of the landmark civil rights legislation bottled up in the committee for years. The unpopularity of that decision in his district contributed to his defeat for reelection in 1964.

In 1972, however, the voters saw the wisdom of returning GILLIS to the House. In the intervening 12 years GILLIS made his mark on this institution. As a moderate Democrat from Louisiana, he served as a bridge between his more conservative colleagues from his region and his more liberal colleagues from other parts of the country. In addition, he served as a bridge between the more senior Members of the House with whom he was first elected in the 1960's and his more junior colleagues with whom he entered Congress during his second House tenure in the 1970's. In both cases, he served as a unifying force for the party and the institution, seeking to reconcile differences and bring Members together to achieve tangible legislative accomplishments.

He also sought to provide a sense of vision and long-term purpose to our party during a period of redefinition and change. As chairman of the House Democratic caucus for the past 4 years, he sought to bring all Members together to define new directions for our party around which we could all rally. I was particularly privileged to work with GILLIS in formulating the forward-looking economic proposals contained in the "Democratic Blueprint for Our Nation's Future" produced by the Democratic caucus. GILLIS shared with me a keen appreciation of the critical importance of international competitiveness to our economy, and the need to develop an industrial strategy for our country to meet the challenge of foreign competition. He made international competitiveness a centerpiece of the proposals put forward by the caucus.

Mr. Speaker, GILLIS LONG was that rare legislator who rose above the parochial concerns of region and generation and brought a truly national and world perspective to the problems of our country. We shall miss his leadership in the difficult times ahead. ●

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, we have lost a good friend and colleague in GILLIS LONG, and the House will be a lesser body for his passing. I was deeply saddened by the news of GILLIS' death. I know that all of us in the House were stunned by the news of his premature death. Now that some days have passed since we heard this sad news, and we have had time to reflect, we feel even a deeper sadness.

GILLIS was an outstanding chairman of the Democratic caucus, who carefully and efficiently forged a concensus among widely varying points of view on many divisive issues. As a senior member of the Rules Committee, GILLIS again showed a degree of professionalism and expertise that served his colleagues on both sides of the aisle with examples of what our work should be, and can be through dedication and understanding.

But GILLIS did not limit his work to assignment or issues of current or passing interest. He maintained a view not only of what the Congress is, but what it ought to be. His Committee on Party Effectiveness was an innovation that has served us well. Indeed, GILLIS applied himself creatively to so many different tasks, all engineered to encourage growth and productivity both within the party caucus and in the House as a whole.

GILLIS served his colleagues as well as his district and the Nation at large. He was an excellent legislator, and a good friend. I deeply regreat his passing.●

● Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, indeed, the passing of the Honorable GILLIS LONG of Louisiana is a loss to the country, the House of Representatives, and a loss to his family. GILLIS was a special friend, a creative spirit and a thoughtful legislator.

He served in the House for over a decade and in the last two sessions made an enormous contribution as the chairman of the Democratic caucus. He led the caucus to unity, but in the process did not purify the caucus. He was a leader in helping us all express our views and work toward a consensus of what we should do. His vision and dedication helped us develop a policy for the future. His leadership, his vision and his kindness will be sorely missed.

GILLIS told me that I have "a great tradition to uphold and an unlimited future to conquer." I hope to meet his challenge and to complete his vision. He was a great man and it was an honor to serve with him in the House of Representatives.●

● Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to join with my colleagues for this tribute today, although I am very saddened by the reason for which this special order has been called.

We have lost an exceptional public servant in Congressman GILLIS LONG. He served in the House of Representatives for some 14 years, during which time he worked consistently for Louisiana and her people.

He will be sorely missed, both here and at home, as GILLIS devoted a large part of his adult life to public service. As Louisiana is a relatively small State, our delegation—regardless of political affiliation—shares a close working relationship. And while GILLIS and I did not agree philosophically all of the time on the issues, we were always united to work for the betterment of our State.

GILLIS was a skilled and forceful legislator, as well as a keen politician. His important and influential positions on the House Rules Committee and within the Democratic caucus attest to his political acumen.

Finally, GILLIS' devotion to cause will be sorely missed. He loved serving the people, and enjoyed it more than any one person I have ever met. His dedication to public life and public service was well known and well respected, and he had profound impact on the Nation and its course.

The House has lost one of its leading advocates, and Louisiana has lost one of its most able Representatives.●

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my condolences and sadness on the departing of our late colleague, GILLIS LONG, to his family and loved ones. Indeed, the people of Louisiana and this House have suffered a great loss and I know I speak for my colleagues when I say we mourn his passing and will miss him dearly.

GILLIS LONG served the Eighth District of Louisiana with great distinction. A specialist in procedure and a true parliamentarian, GIL LONG was a noted negotiator on the Rules Committee. A born leader, GIL distinguished himself as chairman of the Democratic caucus, and was recognized for his even-tempered manner and fairness in dealing with friend or foe. But to merely recite GILLIS LONG's biography is not enough to do him justice.

GIL LONG was a friend to many, a mentor to others, and an example to all of us. Throughout his tenure of service in the House and to our country, GILLIS LONG demonstrated a keen intellect, outstanding leadership abilities and an unfaltering commitment to deeply held principles. Above all else, GIL LONG was an effective Congressman and a true representative of the people. GILLIS LONG will be missed and fondly remembered.●

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I am honored today but of course also saddened to participate in this special order to honor our late and beloved colleague from Louisiana, GILLIS LONG. It was just 10 days ago when we learned the shocking and tragic news of GILLIS' passing and for those of us fortunate to have been his friend—the feeling of loss remains fresh.

I believe it was both fitting and appropriate for the President of the United States, Ronald Reagan to pause and pay tribute to GILLIS as he did at the beginning of his inaugural address on January 21. It was fitting because the President was recognizing the contributions of a man who dedicated his life to serving his fellow man and who set an example of leadership which many emulated.

GILLIS LONG provided the highest quality of representation for the people of the Eighth Congressional District in the Louisiana GILLIS loved so well. He was always their advocate in Washington working to protect, defend, and promote their interests in the Congress. Despite GILLIS many time-consuming responsibilities in Congress, he always made constitutent service his top priority and he was rewarded with reelection by his constituents on six different occasions including this past fall.

Yet GILLIS will be remembered by those of us who served with him for many reasons. He served with special effectiveness as chairman of the Democratic caucus—a job which involves considerable energy and sacrifice but one that GILLIS performed superbly. GILLIS was also a leader on the prestigious House Rules Committee another difficult and challenging task which GILLIS was equal to.

I served with GILLIS these past 12 years and was truly honored to have been his friend. He was a warm, sincere, and friendly man with good humor and camaraderie. He was a man that I and so many others respected. Yet as we recall all the good that was GILLIS LONG, let us commit ourselves not to always wait until it is too late to convey our feelings to one another. Think of all of my colleagues who are participating in this special order who wish they had told GILLIS how they felt about him while he was alive.

I wish to convey my heartfelt condolences to GILLIS' widow—Cathy who for more than 25 years was GILLIS loyal partner and friend. The loss she has suffered is truly enormous as it is to this House and the Nation. Yet let us hope that solace is found for Cathy with the knowledge that her husband led an exemplary life—where he did so much good for so many people. His is a legacy that will serve as an inspiration for those of us who serve in the House today as well as those who will serve tomorrow. May GILLIS rest in peace.●

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to join my colleagues in expressing our sense of deep sadness at the passing of our beloved friend, GILLIS W. LONG.

Congressman LONG served this body with both distinction and dedication. He was a hard worker and an outstanding leader who brought compassion and understanding to the deliberations in this Chamber.

As a senior member of the House Rules Committee and as former chairman of the Democratic caucus, Congressman LONG earned the respect of all with whom he came in contact.

The people of Louisiana's Eighth District were indeed fortunate to have Congressman LONG represent their interests here in Washington with such energy and dedication.

All of us in the 99th Congress will miss Congressman LONG's many contributions to our joint legislative efforts. His work set a high standard of excellence for others to follow who believe in progressive government. I valued his leadership and will miss both his wise counsel and warm friendship.

My deepest sympathy is with his wife, Cathy, his son, George, and his daughter, Janis.●

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues in expressing sadness over the loss of GILLIS LONG and in paying tribute to the memory of a truly dedicated public servant.

I had the pleasure of serving in the House throughout GILLIS' tenure in this body. I knew him to be a man of high principle, and a man with the courage to be true to those principles regardless of the consequences. For him, those consequences were rejection at the polls but he bore his defeats with the same grace that would characterize his many electoral victories. When he returned to the House in 1973, he came on his own terms. About GILLIS LONG I think it can truly be said that the voters knew exactly what they were getting when they supported him, and the ease of his recent victories made clear that they overwhelmingly approved of the manner in which he represented them.

GILLIS was one of the best-liked Members of this House and it was easy to understand why. Although he was a loyal Democrat, he was uniformly fair in trying to work out solutions to the significant problems with which a Congress must deal. He understood the art of compromise, but he also knew that before compromise could be achieved all parties must have a firm understanding of the issue at hand. GILLIS never lost his willingness to study, whether that study involved the rules of this House or the ramifications of a global economy. He was well informed, he worked hard, and he thought before he spoke—all qualities which are not only essential in a good legislator, but are likely to engender respect among one's colleagues as well.

Mr. Speaker, we will miss GILLIS LONG in the difficult days ahead. His ability and his character are commodities this House can ill afford to do without. While we will miss him, his contributions to the people of Louisiana and to his country will never be forgotten.

I want to extend my sincere condolences to GILLIS' marvelous wife Cathy, his children, and his family.●

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, the untimely passing of our friend and colleague GILLIS LONG has saddened us all, and he will be sorely missed in the House of Representatives.

He was a true stateman; widely respected for the way in which he exercised his leadership and constructive in his approach to solving many of this Nation's problems.

As the second in seniority on the Rules Committee, GILLIS often was the driving force in crafting rules for debate on controversial and complex legislation. His great knowledge of House procedure and tremendous negotiating ability were assets to the committee that will be hard to replace.

And, of course, GILLIS' interest in the economy through his membership on the Congressional Joint Economic Committee will be remembered by all of us. He studied many broad economic questions that greatly affect the future of our country.

GILLIS also served as chairman of the Democratic caucus for 4 years, until relinquishing that role last month. In that capacity he worked to unify his party and served as a link between senior Democrats and younger Members. Yet he was also held in high esteem by all of us on the other side of the aisle, and I know that I speak for my colleagues, past and present, when I say that we all benefited from his friendship.

My sympathies go out to his widow, Cathy, and his children George and Janis. Our condolences must also be extended to the people of the Eighth District of Louisiana, who have lost a fine representative.

I thank the gentleman from Louisiana for calling this special order, and allowing me to pay tribute to GILLIS LONG.●

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness in my heart that I rise today to join in this remembrance of our colleague GILLIS LONG, who passed away last week.

I indeed feel a great personal loss as GILLIS and I had established a close and productive working relationship together. In my role as chairman of the Public Works Water Resources Subcommittee, I had the opportunity on many occasions to bring key legislation before the House Rules Committee, where I frequently sought GILLIS LONG's expert advise and guidance.

GILLIS took great joy in his role as a pivotal member of the Rules Committee. He was a perfectionist who loved the complex House rules system. And, unquestionably, he was considered by all who knew him, to be among the most expert in matters dealing with House procedure.

But most importantly, GILLIS LONG was a fair man. Whether it was a Republican or Democrat appearing before the powerful Rules panel, GILLIS made sure she or he had a fair hearing.

It was that same dedication to fairness that made GILLIS LONG the excellent leader of the Democratic caucus that he was. He was a natural candidate for party leadership, and every member of the Democratic Party, with its diverse beliefs can attest to the outstanding job he performed in that most difficult role.

Despite the national prominence that GILLIS LONG attained, he never forgot for 1 minute that his major role in Congress was to represent the interests of the people of the Eighth Congressional District of Louisiana. And represent them he certainly did.

During his eight terms in the House, GILLIS truly became a peoples representative, devoting himself untiringly to his constituents needs, worries, and causes.

GILLIS LONG loved his country and its people. He was a true patriot who wanted the best for America and would not settle for anything less. His good cheer and bright mind will be sorely missed as we here who follow him attempt to solve our Nation's weighty problems in the years ahead.●

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, like so many of my colleagues in Congress, I was stunned last week to hear the tragic news of the untimely death of our distinguished colleague and my good friend from Louisiana, GILLIS LONG.

During the last 12 years he served as a Member of the House of Representatives, I had the opportunity to work with GILLIS on many occasions, and I became one of his great admirers.

GILLIS LONG dedicated his life to public service, and was a man of deep compassion and courage. He served our country with distinction in the European theater during World War II, and was awarded the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart. He also served in the internal security detachment at the Nuremberg war crime trials.

Receiving his law degree from Louisiana State University in 1951, GILLIS LONG distinguished himself as the legal counsel for several congressional committees, including the Senate Small Business Committee and the House Campaign Expenditures Committee. In addition, during President Johnson's administration, he was Assistant Director for Congressional Relations in the Office of Economic Opportunity.

First elected to Congress in 1962 to serve one term, Congressman LONG returned to Congress in 1973, where he compiled an outstanding record of achievement as the second-ranking member of the House Rules Committee, as chairman of its Subcommittee on the Legislative Process, and as a member of the Joint Economic Committee, where he was chairman-elect at the time of his death.

GILLIS LONG was highly respected by all of us in Congress for his commitment to the cause of civil rights. His legislative abilities were unmatched, and he was a statesman of great principle, always striving for compromise and conciliation instead of confrontation.

As the chairman of the House Democratic caucus for 4 years from 1981 to 1984, GILLIS LONG's contribution was significant, and his service was inspirational in shaping our country's future. He authored a number of Democratic Party position, papers, and his presence will sorely be missed by all those he served as well as his colleagues in the House of Representatives.

Those of us who had the privilege of working with GILLIS LONG and knowing him as a friend deeply mourn his passing. Mrs. Annunzio joins me in extending our heartfelt sympathy to GILLIS' DEVOTED WIFE, CATHY, AND THE OTHER MEMBERS OF HIS FAMILY WHO SURVIVE HIM.[1]

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I rise today to pay tribute to GILLIS LONG, a respected colleague and good friend. Over the years, his many accomplishments as chairman of the Democratic caucus and a senior member of the Rules Committee speak of his devotion to the institution of Congress, as well as to his constituents.

GILLIS will be remembered by all of us as a dedicated, compassionate public servant. But more importantly, he was a decent, caring human being committed to making this country a fairer, more just place to live. He will be sorely missed both here and at home.●

● Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, today I join my colleagues in expressing our deep remorse at the loss of our friend, GILLIS LONG. But tempering the remorse is a strong sense of gratitude for the life of service GILLIS offered and the impact he had on his country, his district, the Congress, and many of us individually as his friends.

GILLIS was one of those rare individuals who used his experience and historical perspective to form a clear vision for the future. He understood that if the Democratic Party was to thrive and flourish in the future, unity within the party was crucial, and he committed himself to that unity. I personally first encountered GILLIS' pursuit of unity most strongly in 1981 when he was among the few in the party insisting that we Boll Weevils should not be punished for voting according to our consciences and our districts. GILLIS appreciated the worth of honest debate and open acceptance of all Democrats in the House. Always, his efforts were to unify, and not purify, the Democratic Party in the House.

As time went on and I had the privilege of working with GILLIS on the Committee on Party Effectiveness, my respect for this leader grew deeper and deeper. Our relationship, more private than public, instilled in me a great respect and affection for GILLIS and the goals he sought to accomplish. His untimely death has prevented him from personally accomplishing some of those goals, but as Walter Lippmann once wrote: "The final test of a leader is that he leaves behind him in other men the conviction and the will to carry on." GILLIS has passed along his quest for the unity and acceptance that will continue to guide and strengthen our party and our country. We who honor his memory should willingly accept that endowment and further the cause that GILLIS held dear.

With remorse, but even more so, with a sense of gratitude and mission, we say goodbye to GILLIS LONG.●

● Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, we have lost a man who cared deeply about this institution, his country and his party. Representative GILLIS LONG, a man of courage and principle, was a skilled politician that truly served the national interest. He will be greatly missed, but he has left a legacy for those of us fortunate enough to serve with him and for those to follow.

Many things impressed you about a fine gentleman like GILLIS. I always appreciated the fact that you knew he cared about the Congress and having it work well, and you could trust him, rely on his judgment. He was a Representative that other Members appreciated because of this quality. He also went out of his way to help new Members, to offer guidance and help when needed.

A man of great compassion and understanding, I count his passing a personal loss and value the time and the friendship I was privileged to share with him. The Nation and the Congress have lost an honorable leader and I join with my colleagues in expressing our deepest sympathy to his family and in paying tribute to Representative GILLIS LONG, a good friend and a dedicated colleague.●

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, united in our sorrow, we stand here together to pay our final respects to our respected friend and colleague, GILLIS LONG.

During his many years of public office spanning half a generation, GILLIS had prove himself ever the champion of civil rights for all Americans. His sterling reputation as a just and good man has been burnished by those accomplishments resulting from the staggering amount of work he so tirelessly undertook. As chairman of the House Democratic caucus, and on the House Rules Committee, GILLIS was wholly dedicated to those ideals he held dear. We will all miss GILLIS LONG sorely. I would like to join my colleagues in expressing my sympathy to his wife, Cathy, and to his children, George and Janis, at this time of inconsolable loss and bereavement.

The legacy bequeathed to us by GILLIS LONG is rich indeed. Unswervingly true to his convictions, he nevertheless strove to bring about a consensus of beliefs, a melding process which reflected his deeply founded respect for democracy and fairness. Our sense of sharp loss is eased only by our brimming reservoir of fond memories and deep esteem for our departed colleague.

I know I speak for all of us who are assembled here when I express my feeling of personal sorrow and privation at the passing of our dear friend and associate, GILLIS LONG.●

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, GILLIS LONG's death comes as a terrible blow to me. He was a great human being and an outstanding Member of Congress who possessed qualities we all hope to have and to pass along to our children and grandchildren. I worked closely with GILLIS during my first few terms in the House when we passed war on poverty legislation. He became an Assistant Director of the Office of Economic Opportunity—an act that took courage for one who retained political ambitions and plans.

It was a controversial program toward which many were hostile. Many Members of Congress were skeptical to say the least, while others felt threatened. It was simply not politically popular, but GILLIS LONG took on the congressional liaison job.

To this day, my friend Sargent Shriver says, "Without GILLIS we might not have gotten the legislation through. He was crucial."

GILLIS' concern for the human consequences of legislation was recognized even then. He proved particularly effective dealing with his southern colleagues in both the House and the Senate. He managed at critical times to get enough Republican votes, too.

The essential decency of the man made it difficult for anyone to say "no" to him. Having joined the war on poverty, he never resigned and never strayed. His concern for the poor, the destitute and the underprivileged continued throughout his career.●

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, along with so many of my colleagues I join in mourning the passing of our good friend GILLIS LONG.

This is a special institution. Not everyone understands it. Not everyone knows how to make it work. GILLIS LONG was one of those few who walked through these halls and was completely at home. GILLIS was a man who understood the House, and in the process made the House and each of us who shared it with him a noble place.

How many of us, when faced with a difficult problem, turned to GILLIS for help, for a solution. I imagine we all did at one time or another. And when that advice came, only a fool did not follow it.

I know that as I look forward across the legislative field that will be the 99th Congress, I see a difficult and challenging 2 years. How much easier those years would be if we had GILLIS to help lead us.

I was honored to second GILLIS' nomination to be head of the Democratic caucus when he assumed that important job in 1981. Our colleague from Missouri now has to fill the role that GILLIS created in the years since 1981.

We will all miss GILLIS. We will miss him as a friend, as our caucus chair, and as a colleague. The Nation will also miss GILLIS, because he was a man who made a difference. He was a man who knew what his principles were and fought for them.●

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in paying tribute to GILLIS LONG, who has been taken from us and from his family so abruptly by illness.

GILLIS was truly an indispensible Member of the House of Representatives, and he will be greatly missed, not only by his family and by the Congress but also by his constituents and the entire Nation. As chairman of the Democratic caucus and of the Rules Committee's Subcommittee on Legislative Process, GILLIS was dedicated to improving the way this country is governed. He was a leader in seeking broad reform to improve not only the House but also the Democratic Party. It was under his leadership that the Democratic caucus produced a comprehensive, forward-looking document establishing a Democratic outlook on the Nation's economic future. More importantly, he single handedly made the caucus a cohesive unit for the first time in many years. And his subcommittee was constantly looking for ways of improving the legislative process.

GILLIS was a natural legislative leader. He felt so strongly about making the process work that he was able to bring together many geographic and political factions to enact key legislation. His mastering of the art of compromise and persuasion made him a great legislator. The services he performed for his party and for his country are unsurpassed, and they will survive long after his untimely death.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have served with GILLIS over the past 8 years. He is already greatly missed. I know all of my colleagues join me in expressing sympathy to GILLIS' family.●

● Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, the memory of Members of Congress is preserved so often in no more than the name of a post office or dam in some distant corner of what was their district. The name of GILLIS LONG will be enshrined forever in the Democratic Party, resurrected phoenix-like from the flames of the last national elections. GILLIS created, as Democratic caucus chairman, the Committee on Party Effectiveness, and those who trained in it—DICK GEPHARDT, MARTIN SABO, BUTLER DERRICK, LES ASPIN—are the new shining hope of the party.

What GILLIS taught me as a young legislator when I first came to Congress in 1978 are precisely those virtues the Democratic Party needs to regain that elusive majority. GILLIS was seen as a liberal member of the south central delegation; yet he was personally responsible for the passage of the major business bills in the 98th Congress. The Democratic Party will learn that the advancement of prosperity and a concern for the poor and downtrodden can go hand in hand.

GILLIS was elected in 1962 and lost his seat the following election when his appointment to the House Rules Committee enabled the first civil rights legislation to reach the House floor. GILLIS knew that there are immutable principles which are not worth renouncing for any election. Yet he also knew how to get things done. Always be chivalric; you cannot prepare thoroughly enough; think through your strategy—what you want to get done is irrelevant if you cannot get it done; lead by inclusion, not exclusion; politics is, after all, the art of reaching a consensus. These maxims have been a pretty good working guide for my legislation. I would suggest they offer a serviceable roadmap to return the Democratic Party to the majority. Great men are the guideposts and landmarks in the State.●

● Mr. CHAPPELL. Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman from Louisiana for calling this special order to honor our dear late colleague, GILLIS LONG.

GILLIS first came to this body in 1962, for a single term. He returned to the House of Representatives in 1972 and remained here until his recent untimely death.

During his seven terms, GILLIS proved to be a capable legislator, both on the floor and in committee. As the ranking majority member of the House Rules Committee, he contributed greatly to facilitating floor debate on controversial measures through his concise explanations of the rules governing those measures. His work on the Joint Economic Committee was to his credit, as shown by the fact that he was to have been the new chairman.

GILLIS will probably be best remembered for his able chairing of the House Democratic caucus. It was here that he made his major contributions by authoring a series of papers articulating new policies in such fields as long-term economic and foreign policy, as well as other issues which this body shall debate over the coming years. Here, too, GILLIS made his contribution as a peacemaker, able to bring Members from diverse backgrounds together, united in a common purpose. I know steering this caucus was not an easy task, but it was one that he was more than willing and able to undertake.

GILLIS was a fine servant of the people of Louisiana, and a good colleague who shall be missed by all. I wish also to extend my prayers and condolences to his wife Catherine, and his children, George and Janis, as well as the other members of his family.

I thank the gentleman for permitting me this opportunity to pay tribute to GILLIS LONG, and I appreciate his calling this special order.●

● Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues here today in paying tribute to our friend Representative GILLIS LONG. He was certainly a man dedicated to serving his Louisiana constituents as well as this Nation in the House of Representatives.

His leadership capabilities were easily seen in his capacity as a ranking member of the Rules Committee, and especially as an effective chairman of the Democratic caucus.

His office was next door to mine in the Rayburn Building and both myself and my staff felt an extra sense of sadness upon hearing of his death. GILLIS LONG left much to be remembered from his service in this Chamber. His experience and leadership will be missed.●

● Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few words in praise of my friend, colleague, and fellow southerner, the late GILLIS W. LONG. We worked together in the Democratic caucus and I greatly admired GILLIS' dedication to the unity and future progress of the Democratic Party. As caucus chairman, he worked hard to intregrate all wings of the party and to enlarge the Democratic electorate.

In his work on the Joint Economic Committee, GILLIS displayed his keen interest in developing long-range plans for the further development and increased productivity of the U.S. economy, as well as for more study of the international economy. In his vital position on the House Rules Committee, GILLIS demonstrated his love for and mastery of the nuts and bolts of the legislative process. He was committed to improving the institution he faithfully served—the U.S. House of Representatives.

His was an exemplary political and legislative career—the expression of an individual deeply committed to the great American ideal of public service. GILLIS will be missed sorely by his friends and colleagues and I'm sure that they all join me in expressing our condolences to his wife Cathy and to their children.●

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that we take this time today in order to pay tribute to our departed colleague, Representative GILLIS LONG of Louisiana.

GILLIS exemplified the very best in a public servant. He served his constituents with the utmost distinction and dedication. In addition, he continually gave this body the benefit of his wisdom, his leadership, and his impeccable judgment. His knowledge and keen understanding of rules and procedures in this House will be remembered by us all, and he earned the widespread respect and admiration of everyone who knew him.

But moreover, GILLIS LONG will be remembered as a man of courage. He had the strength to stand up for what he believed was right and fair, even at the risk of his own political career. For this, he has earned a special place in our hearts and in our history books, and he will not be forgotten.

The House of Representatives will be a different place without Gillis Long. I will miss his vision, his guidance, and his good sensible advice—but most of all, I will miss his friendship.

My deepest sympathies go out to his wife Cathy, to his children, and to all of his family.●

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep sadness that I rise to pay respect to our distinguished colleague, GILLIS LONG of Louisiana, who passed away recently after loyal service to this Congress.

GILLIS LONG was a man who served his constituents and the House of Representatives with dedication and conviction. His congressional district was comprised mostly of black Americans and Cajuns, a district with a truly unique character. He exhibited a compassionate concern for these people, never forgetting that he represented interests which required absolute commitment. In this, he succeeded.

Perhaps the most noteworthy contribution of GILLIS LONG was his influence in forging a smoothly efficient rules procedure from within the House Rules Committee. As the second-ranking Democrat within that committee, he aided in the bringing of progressive legislation to the floor of the House. He deserves our respect and gratitude for this accomplishment.

We have lost a fine colleague, Mr. Speaker. Let us remember his example and his legacy.●

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAUX] for providing this opportunity for Members to join in paying tribute to our late friend and colleague, GILLIS LONG.

Mr. Speaker, this House has lost one of its most able Members and I have lost a dear friend, I join all the Members on the House floor today in extending profound sympathy to his wife, Cathy, and his children, George and Janis. Our hearts all go out to the family in this tragic hour.

The passing of a great man affords an opportunity both to mourn his death and to celebrate his life. Each of us will carry our own favorite memories of GILLIS, in facing that sorrow and that joy.

Mine, quite naturally, will be from our service together during a decade on the Rules Committee. The role of the modern Rules Committee is to try to make the legislative process work, and it has been an appropriate showcase for the particular talents of a gentleman reknowned as a professional legislator. GILLIS has never flinched from the hard work needed to put together accommodations that fairly balanced a variety of issues.

For his colleagues from Louisiana, there will be memories of his genuine love for his State and the real joy he derived from representing its people and its interest. Even as his responsibilities and stature in Washington grew, the energy he devoted to representing the Eighth District of Louisiana never slacked. He returned very regularly to his district, something that the Nation's air transportation system does not make easy to do, even during the years when the decline in his health must have made the effort very difficult. And, in Washington, he was an able and passionate advocate of his constituents' concerns. Indeed, after 10 years sitting next to GILLIS at the Rules Committee, I think I may know more than anyone in New England about the economics of sugar and natural gas production.

But, for many of us in the House, the most vivid memory will be the courage and, even, good cheer with which GILLIS faced the physical adversities of his last years. The moving stories of many friends makes it clear that GILLIS knew clearly in recent days that his life was drawing to a close. But, actually, he has known for a few years that his life would not pass all the natural seasons.

And, faced with that knowledge, he actually redoubled his efforts. At a time when other men might have begun to let go of the details and labors, GILLIS actively sought new challenges. His stewardship of the Democratic caucus was a historic one. It was a period of massive work, significant accomplishment, and important reform in the caucus, and the party at large.

In recent days, following the conclusion of his work at the caucus, GILLIS was preparing to take up the chairmanship of the Joint Economic Committee. The Joint Committee was a vital concern to GILLIS throughout his service in Congress, and I have no doubt that his chairmanship of the panel at this time would have made a significant contribution to the coming debates on the economy and the budget.

As chairman of the Democratic caucus, much of his most lasting contribution to Congress has been on one side of the aisle. But that contribution has never been made at the expense of fairness, and the special order today demonstrates that the affection and regard in which GILLIS will always be held spans the entire political spectrum.

And in that spirit, Mr. Speaker, all of us gather here today to say goodbye to GILLIS, to extend sincere sympathy to his family, and to pledge to keep alive the contributions he has made to this institution.●

● Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today with my colleagues to pay tribute to the most esteemed gentleman from Louisiana, the Honorable GILLIS W. LONG who, as commentator-journalist Mark Shields remarked the other day, "died too young".

During his 7 plus terms in the House, my friend GILLIS LONG brought to this body a stablity based on sweet reasonableness, sharing with the rest of us insight based on an outstanding intellect and a thorough comprehension of human nature and the body politick.

I had the distinct honor and pleasure of being closely associated with my good friend and neighbor in a number of official and unofficial capacities. He and I served together on the Congressional Rural Caucus—of which he was a founder—for the 8 years I have been in the Congress. We served in the party organization together and we shared many common interests and many common goals. He recognized that there are unfortunate people in this country who still require and are worthy of help from the Federal Government.

His constituents, the Congress, the State of Louisiana, and this Nation will miss GILLIS LONG and his great capabilities.

Mr. Speaker, in summing up, I cannot help but recall the parable of the talents as told in St. Matthew. Many are given talents, but there are few of us who possess the insight and the ability to capitalize on that gift, multiplying and sharing that gift.

GILLIS LONG utilized the talents entrusted to him for the betterment of mankind and his service accrued good to this Nation. We can, in truth, say in his memory, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant * * *"●

● Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, GILLIS LONG will be deeply missed. He was a man who gave his best in service to his country and through his actions made a difference in the lives of many Americans and certainly in the evolution of the House of Representatives.

I will remember GILLIS most for the tremendous, and indeed historic, contribution he made to revitalizing the policy arm of the Democratic caucus. GILLIS reached out and took many Members like myself under his wing and opened up an avenue—the Committee on Party Effectiveness—through which to channel ideas and to develop policy recommendations to address the many serious problems we face.

One of the deepest honors I have had in my professional career was to serve under GILLIS as co-chair of a task force on international trade for the caucus during the last Congress. As a member of the Committee on Party Effectiveness and as co-chair of the trade task force, I developed a deep respect for GILLIS' capabilities. He understood the importance of developing a vision of the future for our children and he cared deeply about the integrity and commitment to basic human values and economic progress of the Democratic Party and House of Representatives.

The House will not soon forget GILLIS LONG. He will live on and on through the important legacy he left as chairman of the Democratic caucus. He will also be remembered for his courage and leadership as a legislator and for the many contributions to his country and fellow human beings he made over the years.

GILLIS gave us his best. He had dreams and ideals, he sobered them with just enough of reality over the years to be practical and effective in his pursuit of them. Through his actions he energized and improved the lives of many, many people. Above all, GILLIS shared a commitment with us to public service and a deep belief in the greatness of the American culture and government. It is now up to us to carry on the fine work GILLIS did, committed as he was, to economic and human progress on Earth. Our continued dedication to this task could pay him no finer compliment as he watches over us in the years to come.●

● Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to the memory of our colleague, GILLIS LONG. Although I have only just completed my first term in the House and only knew him for a short period, I found Congressman LONG to be a dedicated individual and a very loyal, faithful Democrat.

His absence will leave a void in our leadership that will be difficult to fill. His service on the Rules Committee and as leader of the Democratic caucus was distinguished. He was skilled in the internal workings of this House, and he was constantly working to strengthen and unify his party, seeking to give greater voice to new Members and to build consensus among all factions.

GILLIS LONG, while a fervent partisan, was an outstanding statesman as well. He was bipartisan in his concern for America and its citizens—truly compassionate and caring.

His leadership will be missed by all of us.●

● Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, when this country lost the service of our colleague, GILLIS LONG, it lost a man of conscience, a man of principle, a man who was dedicated to the well-being not only of his own constituents, but of every American. When this House lost GILLIS LONG, it lost a man who believed with all his heart that this is truly the "people's House" and who worked to assure that it was an institution which could fulfill its historic responsibilities. When those of us who have had the good fortune to serve with GILLIS lost him, we lost a friend who would always lend a helping hand, a friend who always had the time to listen and to counsel, a friend who would share from his vast experience to the betterment of all of us.

We will never be able to replace GILLIS LONG, but I encourage my colleagues to pay tribute to him by learning from his spirit and his dedication to doing what is right. None of us in political life can fail to understand the commitment which led GILLIS to take a courageous stand for civil rights at a time when that was not a popular position to take. He clearly put his own personal interests aside to the benefit of the people of this Nation to which he was so dedicated. His decision to do what he knew was right instead of what would have been expedient created short-term political consequences most of us do not want to bear. But that same decision was just as important to the long tenure he ultimately obtained and, more importantly, to the high respect which anyone who knew him held for him.

To his wife, Cathy, and his children, Rhoda and I give our very deepest sympathy. They should know that we are with them in this time of sorrow.●

● Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleagues in remembering and paying tribute to our friend GILLIS LONG who passed away January 20.

Congressman GILLIS W. LONG served with distinction as a Member of Congress representing the people of Louisiana's Eighth Congressional District. He was hard-working, intelligent, and possessed a friendly, outgoing personality. He was diligent in his efforts over the years for what he believed to be the welfare of his constituents and I know his passing is a great loss to them as it is to us in the House.

I had the good fortune to serve with GILLIS for over a decade on the Rules Committee and to work closely with him. Sometimes we were on opposite sides and sometimes we were together. I can tell you GILLIS was a skilled opponent when we differed. He was a staunch ally when we agreed. I have great respect for GILLIS and admiration for his gentlemanly character and for his professionalism as a Member of Congress. His passing leaves a real gap on the committee and is a genuine loss to me personally.

In this sad time I wish to extend my condolences to GILLIS' wife Cathy, his children, and members of the family.●

● Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, Congress and our country have lost a great leader in GILLIS LONG. A decorated combat infantry veteran of World War II, he brought to the House a special type of leadership—direct, frank, practical, and compassionate. He was chairman of the Democratic caucus and a prominent member of the Rules Committee. His special interests included historic preservation, harbors, agriculture, and many other phases of American life. His leadership here will be greatly missed. I think every Member of the House considered him as a true and trusted friend. I doubt that can be said of anyone else to the degree that it can be truthfully said of him. Our deepest sympathies go to his widow and children; and we all hope that the knowledge they have of his great achievements may in some measure lessen their grief, which we all share.●

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I join our colleagues to pay tribute to a dedicated Member, GILLIS LONG, whose absence in this legislative body will be sorely felt. In his 14 years of service, GILLIS radiated his warmth and friendliness to all around him, and his even-tempered nature was well combined with a consistently effective style as a talented legislator.

Popular with all who knew him, GILLIS never forced his ideas on others, but continued to work for a compromise and consensus among his colleagues He mastered the legislative process and aptly used this expertise to help guide many problematic bills smoothly through the Rules Committee.

As many have said, GILLIS was a champion of civil rights. He consistently supported the rights of all Americans even when this stand cost him his seat in the Congress in the late sixties.

GILLIS' work as chairman of the Democratic caucus will continue to guide the party for many years. Innovative and determined to revitalize the role of the caucus, he organized a task force to prepare a blueprint for future Democratic programs. This blueprint will help define the Democratic agenda for years to come.

I valued GILLIS as a friend and a colleague. I appreciated his leadership and companionship and will long remember his friendship.

I join in expressing my sympathy to his wife, Cathy, and their family.●

● Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of loss that I mourn the passing of our colleague GILLIS W. LONG, who represented the Eighth District of Louisiana since 1973.

I have had the privilege of serving with GILLIS on the Rules Committee during my last two terms. In that time, I have come to know him as an outstanding Member of Congress and as a friend.

On the Rules Committee, GILLIS, fully accepted the role of a senior member. His mastery of the rules of the House was second to none, and was frequently demonstrated by precise questioning during committee hearings. He would not hesitate to take the lead on complex issues.

As chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, GILLIS further demonstrated his leadership ability to guide the Democratic Members of the House. In this capacity he instituted reforms to make the party more effective. He was also successful in bridging the gap between the wide range of voices within the Democratic Members of the House.

GILLIS was a man of rare wisdom who combined his knowledge of politics with his understanding of the House rules to speed the workings of the legislative process. Moreover, he was always concerned with the fairness of that process, and he strove to protect the interests of all.

GILLIS was a leader among members of the Rules Committee, as he was in the Democratic Party and in the House. He was often the unsung hero of many compromises worked away from the spotlight of public attention, yet with far-reaching effects.

While we who are his friends may feel a deep personal loss, it is perhaps because of his skillfull behind-the-scenes ability that he will be missed most by the Nation. It is often said upon a leader's passing that his work will be missed. In the case of GILLIS LONG, how true that is.●

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, participating in this special order to memorialize our late colleague GILLIS LONG is one of the saddest official acts I have had to perform in my 4 years as a Member of the House. We all knew that GILLIS had been ill, and of those of us who were privileged to be able to work with him on one or another of the many projects he kept going could tell that he was often in pain—although he went to great lengths to put others at their ease, and not to show that pain unless he thought no one was watching him. But even with these signs of his ill health, to me, as to so many others of our colleagues, the news of his death was a terrible shock. We will miss GILLIS LONG enormously.

GILLIS was the kind of man who ennobles our profession. Elected officials don't always live up to the high expectations that legitimately attach to us and democracy, and all too often it becomes fashionable to mock Members of Congress. GILLIS LONG—through his integrity, his commitment, his passion to make this institution work well, his deep and penetrating intelligence—showed the way democracy is supposed to work. My closest connection with GILLIS LONG came through my membership on the Caucus Committee on Party Effectiveness which he put together and presided over so well. There are not many other Members of the House who could have done the kind of job that GILLIS did with this Committee—in few if any other places in this city did a group of strong-minded individuals of varying political ideologies come together week after week on a regular basis, not only to discuss the most difficult substantive and political issues that confront us, but often to come to some consensus on them. And it was GILLIS who led the way in this endeavor.

The country will miss GILLIS' devotion to the public good. The House will miss the enormous skills he brought to the job of legislating. The Democratic Party will miss one of our most stimulating and thoughtful voices for intelligent change. And an awful lot of us will miss a very good friend, who was a delightful man, and an extraordinarily stimulating colleague. I appreciate the initiative that our colleague, Mr. BREAUX, has taken in giving us this chance to say some small part of what GILLIS meant to us, and how deeply we will miss him.●

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in tribute to the life and service of our departed colleague and friend GILLIS LONG who we lost Sunday night. While we mourn the passing of a valued legislative craftsman of historic proportions we gratefully celebrate his life's work as a faithful, tireless, productive public servant and true representative of those he affectionally served from the Eighth District of Louisiana.

GILLIS LONG's was an outstanding career. In his years among us he never lost touch with the needs of his constituents yet his vision always extended far beyond his home district and State to encompass the cares and concerns of an entire Nation. His faith in that Nation and his compassionate understanding of America's fundamental principles served as the inspiration for his passionate and relentless support of the causes he chose to champion.

Our colleague was both a pilgrim and a pioneer whose efforts as a Member of the House brightened the lives of millions now living and many yet unborn. We who remain after him today dedicate ourselves to keeping alive his dreams.

GILLIS LONG was my friend and my neighbor. On many an agricultural issue we worked together and his help always proved invaluable. I will miss him and while his passing is a great loss to his legion of friends and admirers, his colleagues here in this body, and to the Nation, his spirit will live on in our hearts and in these Halls.●

● Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, it causes me great sorrow to recognize the loss of so fine a colleague as GILLIS LONG. Over the years I have come to respect GILLIS and look to him as one of the most capable Members of the House of Representatives.

When I began my first term in this House, in 1973, GILLIS was returning after an 8-year absence. As our careers progressed, I came to respect GILLIS for his ability to bring individuals of many differing viewpoints to some sort of working compromise.

As chairman of the House Democratic caucus, GILLIS helped steer the party toward addressing the problems of the future. He helped construct a foundation that, if we continue to build onto it and strengthen it, will launch not only the party, but America, on a sure course for the remainder of the decade and beyond.

When President Reagan began his inaugural address by calling attention to GILLIS' absence, we were painfully reminded that the sense of loss we felt was not only personal, but was also one for the Nation.

As we begin this new congressional session, we should allow GILLIS' spirit to remind us of the direction in which we should attempt to steer our country. The work he began with the rest of us will not end. Ours is not a body that depends upon one man for leadership, but it relies on many for inspiration. The inspiration provided by GILLIS LONG will live on.●

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep sorrow I rise today to speak of our departed friend and colleague from Louisiana's Eighth District, the Honorable GILLIS W. LONG.

Elected to serve in this distinguished Chamber eight times, GILLIS' contributions were many. Whether it was through his position on the Rules Committee, the Joint Economic Committee or Democratic caucus, which he chaired for 4 years, GILLIS continually worked at making America stronger.

Although we all could think of many reasons for GILLIS' great success over the years, I suppose his ability to work with all the Members, whether they be liberal Democrats or conservative Republicans, was his greatest asset. He would listen to all sides, and then, and only then, make his decision on a particular issue.

GILLIS' determination and dedication will be sorely missed. The people of Louisiana and, in fact, the Nation have been lucky that GILLIS chose a career in the public sector. He was a good friend and I shall miss him a great deal.

My wife, Lee, joins me in expressing deep sorrow to GILLIS' widow, Cathy, and their two children, George and Janis.●

● Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my great sadness and sense of loss at the passing of my colleague, GILLIS W. LONG. Through my years in Congress, I came to know GILLIS as one of the most capable and popular Members of this body. His presence will be sorely missed by one and all.

GILLIS lived the life of an exemplary public servant. From the battlefields of Europe where he was decorated with the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart, to the Halls of Congress where he was held in high esteem by his colleagues on both sides of the aisle, GILLIS demonstrated his deep commitment to serve the people of Louisiana and the Nation.

But GILLIS will be missed by more than merely the people of Louisiana who chose him to be their representative in Congress eight times. His remarkable legislative prowess and his affability earned him the respect of all who worked with him. As an influential member of the Rules Committee, he became an important figure in the Democratic leadership in the House. As chairman of the Democratic Caucus for both the 97th and 98th Congress, GILLIS played a crucial role in developing a program for the party's future by producing a series of extraordinary papers on a variety of economic issues.

In the 99th Congress, GILLIS was to serve as chairman of the prestigious Joint Economic Committee. As a member of that committee, I was looking forward to serving under his chairmanship as we examined the vital economic issues which we face today. I am sure that GILLIS would have met this challenge with characteristic dedication and exceptional ability. The Congress, indeed the Nation, would have profited greatly from the results of his endeavors.

I feel a deep personal loss at GILLIS' passing, and wish to express my sincerest condolences to his wife Cathy and and his children George and Janis. I shall miss him, too.●

● Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, the recent and sudden passing of our esteemed and capable colleague from Louisiana, GILLIS LONG, was a shock to me and I know that we shall all miss him in the Halls of Congress.

I had known GILLIS since being elected to the House from Hawaii in 1976 and knew him as an effective and well-liked Member. My heart goes out to Cathy and the other members of the family in this time of their bereavement. May it console them to some extent in the knowledge that GILLIS had so many friends on the Hill who care and I will always have a feeling of Aloha for him.

GILLIS, as the chairman of the Democratic Caucus, displayed a remarkable prescience when he appointed a task force to develop a blueprint for our party's legislative program for the rest of this decade. The resulting "Rebuilding the Road to Opportunity" with its stress on economic solutions rather than on redistribution of wealth reflects a consensus which has built up in America over the past decade or more, and is a study that we should all pay heed to.

Personally, I am forever indebted to GILLIS, who, as a member of the Rules Committee, was instrumental in the passage of the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981 which included the sugar provision which was of vital importance to our sugar industry in Hawaii. I can never thank him enough for his help.

We shall all miss GILLIS as a warm and caring individual. I hope that the passage of time will ease somewhat the grief that the family feels and make it possible for them to reminisce over the happier moments in their lives together.●

● Mr. SABO. Mr. Speaker, like many Members of the Congress, I feel the loss of GILLIS LONG in a very personal way. GILLIS befriended me when I arrived in Washington and he was a leader and counselor for me and many others throughout the 6 years I knew him.

GILLIS LONG practiced the art and science of government at the political level as well as anyone I have known in the 24 years I have worked at it. His purpose in the House was to bring people together. His manner was conciliatory. His natural style was to include, not exclude.

Just before his death, GILLIS completed 4 years as chairman of his caucus, serving during what all would agree was a difficult period. Perhaps the greatest accomplishment of his leadership was the building of bridges between Members with divergent backgrounds and points of view. GILLIS was a tolerant man and he tried to encourage tolerance among the rest of us for each other's beliefs and goals. He was also a practical man and he worked to lead his caucus to the understanding that compromise and accommodation are necessary to make progress.

GILLIS' district is 1,000 miles down the Mississippi from my own. He was a man from the deep South, far from my own home region. But he understood my legislative concerns and he cared about my people's needs. He did his work in Congress in a way that showed he was a truly national leader.

This institution will surely miss him, because he cared about the Congress and strove to make it work the way the Founding Fathers intended. We will surely miss him, too, because he was, in the best sense, a teacher, a leader, and a friend.●

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my deep sense of loss in the passing of GILLIS LONG. He was truly a giant in the institution of the House; he was a good friend and an honored colleague—not only to me, but to all of us.

GILLIS had the best qualities of a courtly southern gentleman. He was courteous and he was as honest as the day is long. What I loved best about him was the reverence and respect he showed for this institution, for its traditions and its history, and for its reliance on fairness and honor.

The integrity shown by GILLIS LONG benefited all of us, as much by virtue of its example to the rest of us as by its own merits. He was an outstanding individual, an outstanding legislator, and an outstanding Representative for the deserving people of the Eight District of Louisiana.

It is with great sadness that this House loses GILLIS LONG. I can only hope that Members, now and in the future, will take from the marvelous example he provided us of how a Member should comport himself in this great body. From his memory we all can learn, and we all should seek to emulate the fine qualities he showed to us. The legacy he left us is large, do we but have the wisdom to partake of it.

To his wife Cathy, and to his children, I know I speak for all my colleagues in expressing our deepest sympathy at the death of one of our truly great colleagues.●

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, GILLIS LONG was one of the very best. Only a few congressional districts have been represented by the kind of common sense, courage and compassion that this good man embodied.

GILLIS was a leader who refused to run for cover when important, controversial issues were at stake. A whole generation of southern political leaders found a moment of truth in the 1950's and 1960's when civil rights dominated the agenda in a time of difficult change. GILLIS LONG passed that test of conviction with high marks—and he paid a political price in the process. He wanted to make the House a better institution, and he played a key role to that end.

Mr. Speaker, you said it well earlier, when you said that GILLIS LONG was a "profile in courage." He was, of course. And he was willing to do the right thing, when it was not the popular thing.

GILLIS LONG did not seek out confrontation for the sake of confrontation. Instead, he sought real solutions to the Nation's real problems. He worked hard at it, and he was effective.

GILLIS and his wife, Cathy, were a very special couple. I was proud to be the recipient of their generosity and hospitality. My greatest sympathy and affection goes out to her and the family.

A giant of the Congress has gone down.

We will miss him very much.●

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to pay my respects to the memory of GILLIS LONG. He became my colleague when we were both elected to Congress in 1962 and although he served only one term before returning to Louisiana, he remained by friend.

He returned to Congress in 1972 and we were pleased to once again have his wit and intelligence in our midst. GILLIS served with great distinction as a member of the Rules Committee, rising to the position of ranking majority member. His knowledge of the rules of procedure for this Chamber will be missed.

Besides making his mark on the Rules Committee, GILLIS did double duty by serving as chairman of the Democratic caucus. Our caucus sessions can be spirited at times but GILLIS always chaired with calm and equanimity.

GILLIS was always a southern gentleman in the finest sense of the term and he was a friend on whom I knew I could rely for sound advice and counsel.

I extend to his family my deepest sympathy. We all mourn the passing of this fine American.●

● Mr. SAM B. HALL, JR. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound sorrow and a deep sense of personal loss that I join my colleagues in paying respect to the late GILLIS LONG who has been taken from us in the very prime of life.

GILLIS LONG was a hard working and dedicated to the House as anyone. He knew the art of compromise, and he understood the legislative process. He fought for Congress as a truly coequal branch of Government, and he was recognized for this great constitutional service to our Nation.

GILLIS LONG was related to one of America's great political families. Like the Adams and Kennedy families in Massachusetts, the Tafts in Ohio, and the Byrds in Virginia, the Long family in Louisiana has a proud political tradition. GILLIS LONG was part of that tradition, and he enjoyed tremendous support in the Eighth Congressional District, and, indeed, throughout the State of Louisiana.

While I often differed with GILLIS LONG on certain issues, he always agreed to disagree in a manner befitting a gentleman. He was an effective and admired chairman of the Democratic caucus, because he understood that a Member of Congress must vote his conscience and his congressional district. He understood very well that in order for a political party to survive it must be willing to embrace varying points of view and philosophies. He understood the admonition of Winston Churchhill that when the political party system becomes polarized with extremes whether right or left, a democracy will not exist for very long.

In addition to his distinguished record as a public servant, GILLIS LONG was also a patriot of the first order. He fought in the infantry in World War II and was awarded the Purple Heart and the Bronze Star. He loved his country and he loved his native State of Louisiana. In fact, the geographical configuration of the Eighth District is really a microcosm of Louisiana with its wonderful people and unique culture.

I count it a high privilege to have known and to have served with GILLIS LONG. We have lost a wonderful friend and the Nation has lost a great leader. To his wife, Mary Catherine, and his children, I extend my deepest sympathy on this sorrowful occasion.●

● Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, as a new Member of the House, I did not have the privilege to know our late departed colleague, GILLIS LONG of Louisiana. Yet, although our paths did not cross, I have been able to realize the high regard GILLIS was held by his colleagues and peers.

During the past several weeks, I have sought the counsel of several senior Members of this body. In almost every instance, one of the people I was told I should talk with and get to know was GILLIS LONG. Everyone agreed that GILLIS was a pillar of this institution, a man respected by Members on both sides of the aisle and of every political philosophy.

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic Party currently is searching to find its identity and chart its course for the years ahead. GILLIS LONG was the epitome of common sense and moderation. In that regard, his death is a serious blow to our party. We have lost a leader, just as the House of Representatives has lost one of its giants.

I join with my colleagues in sending my condolences to GILLIS' wife, Cathy. We share in her loss as we remember today a great statesman and political craftsman.●

● Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, I join today in mourning the recent death of our colleague, GILLIS LONG of Louisiana.

During his 13 years in the House, GILLIS served admirably and ably. His counsel, diligence, and dedication are well known to all of us. His influence has been far-reaching, and his absence will be felt each day.

He worked long and hard as chairman of the Democratic caucus, making it more of what a caucus should be—a place to talk out ideas and come to some common agreements about our party's direction. His work with the caucus helped stimulate a good deal of rethinking in Congress about the kinds of economic solutions we need and the kinds of policies we as Democrats should pursue. As a leader on both the Joint Economic Committee and the Rules Committee, GILLIS worked for the values he believed in, never worrying about catching the limelight. He cared about the outcome.

GILLIS was a leader. His legacy to all of us should be to work harder, continue to strive, and try to work together to accomplish the many important goals GILLIS LONG had for the country.●

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAUX] for reserving this time for Members to pay tribute to the late Congressman GILLIS LONG. MY GOOD FRIEND AND COLLEAGUE, GILLIS LONG, died suddenly on Sunday, January 20.

Those of us in the House who worked with GILLIS LONG through the years will miss him. I not only will miss his friendship but also his leadership. I know that his constituents from the Eighth Congressional District of Louisiana will miss the exceptional level of service and representation GILLIS provided.

Mr. Speaker, Congressman LONG first served in the House from 1963 until 1965. He was reelected to the Congress in 1972.

Fascinated with the procedures of the House of Representatives, Congressman LONG was an active and vocal member of the House Rules Committee. He served as the Chairman of the House Rules Subcommittee on the Legislative Process.

In addition to his service on the committee and chairmanship of the subcommittee, GILLIS served as the chairman of the House Democratic caucus for many years. In his role as chairman of the Democratic caucus, GILLIS again displayed his concern not only for the American people but also the legislative process designed to meet the needs of the people.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, at the time of his passing, GILLIS was about to be elected chairman of the Joint Economic Committee. Keeping in mind his ability and interest in congressional procedures and expertise in economics, I know that GILLIS would have done an exceptional job as the chairman.

GILLIS LONG made an indelible mark on the House of Representatives. By helping to improve the manner in which the Congress operates, GILLIS enhanced our ability to serve the people of this great Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I send my heartfelt condolences on the passing of my good friend and colleague GILLIS LONG to his family, to the people of the Eighth Congressional District of Louisiana and the members of the Louisiana congressional delegation. Again, I thank the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAUX] for reserving this time to remember a very special man—GILLIS LONG.●

● Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, the passing of GILLIS LONG should make each of us stop to think what it is to be a Member of the House of Representatives.

For GILLIS LONG was truly a man of the House. He embodied the best qualities of a public figure, including dedication to principles, respect for colleagues, and a faith in the democratic process. His belief in standing for what was right caused him political misfortune at times in his career, but that steadfastness contributed to the good fortune of the country.

Those of us who are Members of this House would do well to reflect on what GILLIS LONG taught us. We can stick to our principles while treating our colleagues with respect, making the democratic process work as it is designed to work. In so doing, we can offer no higher tribute to the memory of GILLIS LONG.●

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in paying tribute to the memory of the Honorable GILLIS LONG. We have all lost an able colleague and a good friend. We share this loss with the rest of the country. GILLIS LONG displayed the same type of leadership in the Democratic Party as he provided the people of Louisiana throughout his brilliant career of public service. He was the driving force behind the revitalization of the party caucus, but his loss crosses partisan lines.

The loss of GILLIS LONG will be felt by the whole Nation, by all who live in freedom. GILLIS LONG always stood by his beliefs even at great personal and political risk. He would not back away from his convictions due to popular opinion. He kept his integrity and he kept his dignity. This Congress and this country will miss GILLIS LONG. On behalf of the people of southern West Virginia, I offer my condolences to his family. The thoughts and prayers of all of us are with you.●

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding American, a truly remarkable legislator and an honored colleague. It is indeed with a deep sense of loss that we mourn the passing of our friend, GILLIS LONG. His absence from the Halls of Congress will be sorely felt and his presence and service deeply missed.

Congressman GILLIS W. LONG served the people of Louisiana's Eighth Congressional District with great distinction and care. His work as the chairman of the Democratic caucus will continue to influence its direction and his outstanding contributions will continue to be felt in the years to come.

GILLIS LONG was a man of principle, a man whose word was his bond, a man who was there to help. Through his dedication, he helped to make this Nation and the lives of a great many of his fellow men better. He served as an example for all of us to follow.

The magnitude of his contributions can never be measured. Perhaps it is enough to say that we are all in his debt, just as those who come after will be in his debt for what he has left behind.

I wish to join with my colleagues in expressing my sincere condolences to his wife Cathy and his children. May we never forget what he has given all of us.●

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to add my voice to those who have spoken over the last few days to express the collected grief of the House of Representatives at the loss of GILLIS LONG, our colleague from Louisiana. An able and articulate legislator, a compassionate and humble man, GILLIS LONG's contribution to the Nation, the House and the Democratic Party will be sorely missed. His leadership in the Rules Committee and his direction of our party caucus will be admired and remembered well into the future.

Congressman LONG's was dedicated to finding new ways to increase the productivity of our economy and build for a prosperous future. His leadership of the Democratic caucus was largely responsible for the drafting of a long-term economic policy report, "Rebuilding the Road to Opportunity," in 1982. That report, which found the support of many House Members, sought to provide a blueprint for our future, a commonsense approach to our problems in industrial development and world trade.

GILLIS LONG's death is a tragedy. With his passing, Congress and the country have lost not only an outstanding and effective legislator but a legislator who had the courage and ability to look beyond his own political self-interest to do what he believed was right. His outlook was toward the future. I join my fellow Members in expressing my condolences to the Long family during this difficult time.●

● Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I join my colleagues in paying tribute to our departed colleague, GILLIS LONG of Louisiana. His death leaves us all with a great sense of loss. He was a man of integrity and courage who led by example. In times of great controversy and hot rhetoric, we could always count on GILLIS LONG to bring his unique sense of justice and his sense of order to the issue before us.

My closest association with him was serving with him on the Executive Committee of the Congressional Rural Caucus. We all know of his commitment to his principles, and no where was that commitment anymore evident than in the Rural Caucus. His sense of economic justice and his compassion for the difficult struggles of rural people guided his involvement in the rural caucus. I appreciated him so much for that and I must add that the rural people are among those segments of our society who lost a great deal with the death of GILLIS LONG.

In closing, I want to extend to GILLIS' family my deepest regrets. We will all remember him for his dedication to his ideals and his devotion to insuring justice for all members of our society.●

● Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, GILLIS LONG was a good friend of mine and a very fine human being. His death last Monday shocked and saddened me and I know that the sense of loss that I feel is shared by all of us.

GILLIS was a masterful legislator who loved the House, and I do not have to tell you that he made many real and lasting contributions to this body. I admired greatly his intelligence and consummate skill, but I want to say that GILLIS LONG combined those gifts with a sense of national purpose and vision that set him apart from many of the skilled and able Members that I have known during my nearly 35 years in the House.

Like many Members from his part of the country, GILLIS represented a district where involvement in national issues was not a particular political asset. The fact that GILLIS LONG did not choose the easy or convenient route to a successful political career is a monument to the kind of man he was. We will miss him in this House and I extend my most sincere condolences to Mrs. Long and all his family.●

● Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, 2 days ago, the House Rules Committee met to organize itself for the 99th Congress. When we met, it was obvious that a large part of the heart, soul and intellect of our committee was missing; our good friend and colleague, GILLIS LONG was no longer among us.

It was my sad privilege to travel to Alexandria, LA, 2 weeks ago to pay my final respects to my dear friend. The delegation traveling to Louisiana was large and diverse, as was GILLIS' influence and respect among his colleagues and acquaintances.

There is no dispute that GILLIS was a master of house parliamentary procedure—it is a shame that he never enjoyed the position of chairman of the committee to which he devoted so much of his time and energies. The absence of his intellect and skill will leave a considerable void on our committee.

There is no dispute that GILLIS was a master of the political process in the House of Representatives—at the conclusion of his tenure as chairman of the Democratic caucus, he gave us a newly rejuvenated policy and decision making organization which will be of tremendous importance for years to come to me and my colleagues on my side of the aisle. GILLIS sought frank and open discussion leading to meaningful consensus among the divergent members of his party—it is a lesson and a legacy we must adhere to.

There is no dispute that GILLIS was a model of the "new south" Democrat of which I count myself. GILLIS not only took the right position on expansion of the Rules Committee membership to break the hold it had over civil rights legislation in the early 1960's, but paid the price in losing his seat.

But as is the mark of any truly great individual, GILLIS demonstrated the capacity to rebound from defeat, not only from the loss of his House seat, but from his unsuccessful races for Governor. Mr. Speaker, these are events which make individuals strong, and anyone who knew GILLIS knew him to be a man of unquestioned integrity and will. His word was far more reliable than many individuals' signatures to a binding agreement.

Mr. Speaker, there is no dispute that this House will suffer from the loss of this great legislator; my party will suffer from the loss of this politician and statesman; and my committee will suffer from the loss of a central participant and contributor to the important and complex work of the Rules Committee.

On a personal level, Mr. Speaker, I have lost a very dear friend. I enjoyed many pleasant hours in social settings with GILLIS, and learned greatly from my day-to-day interactions with him here in the House of Representatives. I hope to in some measure carry on GILLIS' work as chairman of the Subcommittee on the Legislative Process, and hope to follow his model as a Member of this legislative body.

My condolences and sympathies go to Cathy and their children. It will indeed be a privilege and honor when Cathy is seated as a Member of this Chamber in several months time.●

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, GILLIS LONG was my friend. Though we were of different political persuasions, our personal relationship was excellent. He was always most accommodating in my appearances before the Rules Committee. GILLIS was a fighter. He fought hard for those issues and programs which he espoused. He had great tenacity, and he worked hard and diligently for his State and district.

Louise and I visited with GILLIS' lovely wife, Cathy, the day of his passing and she knows of our personal feelings and sorrows as she mourns her loss. We once again say, "our prayers are with you during this time of sorrow."●

● Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my sorrow at the January 20 passing of our colleague, GILLIS W. LONG of Louisiana. His death was completely unexpected, and I know that all of my colleagues were shocked to learn of this tragedy as we were prepared for the public ceremony inaugurating President Reagan on January 21. I am sure that we were all appreciative of President Reagan's calling for a moment of silence in Congressman LONG's memory during the Inauguration ceremony in the Capitol Rotunda.

GILLIS LONG was elected in 1972 after an absence from the House of 6 years. He came from a distinguished Louisiana family and was a power in the House as a member of the Democratic leadership. He was the chairman of the House Democratic Caucus during 1980 to 1984 and was the ranking Democrat on the powerful House Rules Committee. His knowledge of House rules and procedure was well known. Additionally, he was a senior member of the prestigious Joint Economic Committee and was scheduled to be its chairman during the current 99th Congress.

Mr. Speaker, GILLIS LONG was a giant in the House and one of our most respected Members. The people of the Eighth District of Louisiana were extremely well served by our late colleague. I offer my deep sympathy to his wonderful family.●

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, our colleague, GILLIS LONG, brought to the House many, many talents which have been remarked upon and written about extensively since we lost him last month.

As my colleagues know, GILLIS and I worked together closely during his terms as caucus chairman. In my own mind, GILLIS' greatest talent—and his most lasting monument—was his ability to bring the diverse elements of our party together. His warmth, his energy, his commitment to Government and to the House were all elements in that talent. But from my point of view, there were two other elements which I would like to suggest as an example for us all.

First, GILLIS understood that, all too often, Democrats have an amazing ability to get in each other's way. We are a party of widely divergent and strongly—often obstinately—held views. We often battle each other harder than we battle the opposition. GILLIS understood that, and he knew how to overcome it. In his wonderful, unthreatening way, he appealed to the best in all of us, and to our loyalty to the basic beliefs we share. GILLIS loved "participatory democracy," and we all trusted him enough to participate.

Second, GILLIS understood that the House works best when its work is dominated by ideas, not by politics. GILLIS believed that form should follow agreement on what we stand for and what we want to achieve. GILLIS reflected this belief throughout his career in the House, from his famous vote to expand the Rules Committee to his chairmanship of the caucus.

So much has already been said about this warm and able legislator. But I want to share with my colleagues a profile that to me truly captures the essence of GILLIS LONG. Written by Alan Schlein for the Shreveport Journal, it offers a view of GILLIS of value to all of us.

While we miss GILLIS, let's learn from his example.

Mr. Speaker, I insert the article in the RECORD at this point:

The article follows:

[From the Shreveport Journal, Jan. 30, 1985]

GILLIS LONG—THE MAN IN THE CENTER

(By Alan M. Schlein)

WASHINGTON.—The cross-section of politicians present at Gillis Long's funeral last week in Alexandria demonstrated the profound impact the veteran Congressman had on his Congressional colleagues.

They were all there—old-generation New Dealer Rep. Claude Pepper, D-Fla., Majority Leader Jim Wright, D-Tex., conservative Rep. Buddy Roemer, D-La., conservative Republican Rep. Henson Moore, R-La., and moderate junior members like Reps. Mike Synar, D-Okla., and Tony Coehlo, D-Cal. They were among three busloads full of Congressmen who flew to Louisiana to pay their last respects to Long.

While some legislators hope to be remembered in future generations by a building or a post office named after them, Long has left a legacy that could dominate Congress well into the next century.

All sides—the conservatives, moderates, liberals, the young and the old—praised Long for being, as Rep. Lindy Boggs put it: "The lightning rod that brought us all together to the center of the party."

Long was the bridge between the young and the restless post-Vietnam era Congressmen, who came to Washington to change the status quo and the older veterans who defended it.

Because he did his work behind the scenes, Long's contribution went largely unnoticed by his Louisiana constituents. But it was his remarkable ability that got the mavericks and the veteran members to rationally converse about issues which for years had caused ideological rifts. Largely due to Long, the next generation of Democratic leaders are ready and excited about taking over the reins of power, instead of being afraid of it.

"Gillis believed in the institution of Congress and that the young people could play a major role in the institution now," said Coehlo, a Long protege, who now heads the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "He was the bridge between the leadership and the middle management and the youngsters. He had a feeling that it could all be brought together.

"The Godfather has left us," Coehlo said as he prepared to go to the funeral last week. "But he's left us in a good position. He has said 'Now go out on your own.'"

Rep. Martin Frost, D-Tex, who worked with Long when he headed the Democratic Caucus from 1980-84 and served with him on the powerful House Rules Committee, said, "There is somewhat of a void now that Gillis is gone, but it's not as big a void as there would have been four years ago, thanks to Gillis."

Long gained the respect of all of his colleagues—Republicans and Democrats alike—because he never shied away from a fight. "Gillis was not afraid to look you in the eye and beat you," said Roemer. "I never heard him say he was going to pass on an issue."

From his first year in Congress, Long, who died Jan. 20 at age 61 of heart failure, was a progressive legislator. "There are two types of politicians," explained Majority Whip Bill Alexander, D-Ark. "Those that sense a change and follow direction and those who see the need for change and provide leadership. Gillis was always quick to sense change. He was not the kind to run out and join a parade, however, he was always ahead."

Long was sent to Congress representing the "old South" a place where Alexander said Congress was seen as "a baronnial estate run by powerful chairmen." This was a place where it was standard operating procedure for freshmen not to utter a word throughout their entire two-year term in deference to their elders.

But Long had foresight that immediately got him into trouble. In his first legislative year, Long startled other Southern legislators by voting to expand the membership of the House Rules Committee—a move which allowed major civil rights legislation to reach the House floor.

That legislation earned him the respect of then-civil rights activists Martin Luther King Jr., Andrew Young and a generation of future black leaders. Maryland Rep. Parren Mitchell, Small Business Committee chairman, labeled Long's vote an "enormously courageous stand," on civil rights which "set a pattern for Louisianians to follow."

But that same vote was responsible for Long's 1964 defeat in a race-baiting campaign against his cousin Speedy Long. His opponent went so far as to use the slogan "Vote against the man who voted against the South."

And the people of the 8th District did just that. Long went to work in Washington in 1964 for the Office of Economic Opportunity under President Lyndon Johnson, said Sargent Shriver where Long played an indispensible role in pursuading Congress to implement much of Johnson's Great Society agenda.

"Gillis was exceptionally gifted at understanding the political needs of individual congressmen and senators. He understood and know how to explain legislative objectives and had an extraordinary ability to win the trust of everyone," Shriver said.

He also credited Long with being "crucial" in explaining Johnson's "allout war on poverty . . . He was responsible for gaining the initiative to begin the Head Start program, the Job Corps" and dozens of others.

Long ran unsuccessfully for governor in 1963, finishing third and again ran in 1971, after successfully establishing himself as an investment banking lawyer. He made valuable contacts with during that period, which helped him to build a financial warchest for future Congressional races that scared off many potenital opponents. Later in his Congessional leadership position, he was able to help get business leaders to financially support the new generation of Democratic rising stars.

Rep. John Breaux, D-Crowley, told a story about Long's "Midas" touch. Breaux said he once walked into Long's office to wait for him and accidently pushed some buttons on Long's automatic telephone dialing machine. Before he could shut the machine off, Breaux would say, he had raised $100,000.

Baton Rouge's Moore also said he learned the warchest lesson from Long, and presently leads his 435 House colleagues with more than $700,000 in his bank account for his next race.

When Long returned to Washington and Congress in 1972, he found it in a process of change from the chairman-dominated institution to one where all members could speak and be heard. Between 1972 and 1982, a remarkable 70 percent of the House had turned over, leaving Long one of its respected senior members.

Long, who was in line to become chairman of the powerful House Rules Committee, saw it as his responsibility to guide the newcomers along and let them take an active role in party politics. While the new members didn't control the power through committee chairmanship, they did constitute a majority.

Long, who in 1980 became Chairman of the Democratic Caucus, also realized the younger members represented what he termed "an emerging new force within our Democratic party—made up of new members of Congress, young in mindset, if not in age, who will become the next generation of leaders in our country and in our party."

Long also served as the lone peacemaker between the conservatives and the liberals in 1981 when several of his Louisiana colleagues joined the Boll Weevil conservative Democrats in voting for President Reagan's first budget.

Long listened as his liberal friends sought to punish the renegades, but as caucus chairman he forced both sides into a room and waited as both sides aired their frustrations—privately. Almost singlehandedly, colleagues remember, Long forced the liberals to overlook the conservative's transgressions for the sake of party unity. That unity resulted in major Democratic gains in Congress during the 1982 mid year elections.

Long also took a group of bright junior members, including present Caucus Chairman Richard Gephardt, D-Mo., and Telecommunications Subcommittee Chairman Timothy Wirth, D-Colo., and developed two long-term policy papers designed to rebuild the future of the Democratic Party. The papers were a compilation of post New Deal economic solutions that emphasized productivity rather than redistribution of wealth.

Aside from time spent with his wife, Cathy, and an occassional fishing trip, Long's life was Congress. He was a tireless workaholic, who continued to work 15 hour days despite suffering a mild heart attack in 1979 and a triple-bypass operation in 1980. But 15 hours was short, compared to the 18- and 20-hour days he worked before the heart problems began.

Long commanded the respect of even his enemies for his sixth sense at political dealmaking and coalition building. Despite a reputation for being a social liberal, Long balanced his economic votes with a steady conservative record on Louisiana issues such as oil and gas policy and water projects.

This carefully-crafted political balancing act did not endear him to any one constituency; through his career he got mediocre ratings from liberal and conservative groups alike, but he was able to raise money from both.

The most fitting tribute to the Louisiana native comes from one of his proteges. Said Rep. Tim Wirth of Colorado: "He had exactly what this institution needs—a sense of the future, the ability to bring along new people and new ideas, a good organizational ability and a good sense of humor as well as the love of a good fight."

Those skills enabled Long to leave a legacy that will surpass practically all of the colleagues of his generation.

"It's truly a shame that the good guys die," said Wirth, "because he really was one of the good guys."●

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

FAIRNESS IN SUBCOMMITTEE RATIOS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I was advised that, on five out of the seven subcommittees on the House Judiciary Committee, the subcommittee ratio will not reflect the ratio at the full committee. This unilateral decision serves to prevent Republicans on our committee from the ability to fully represent their constituents and fully participate in the deliberations of our committee.

This is a continuing irony and reflection of unfairness of the majority party in this House. The party that talks about fairness on so many national issues, does not, in fact, practice what it preaches when it comes to organizing this House. But this is new to the Judiciary Committee. In the three prior Congresses, all Judiciary Subcommittees fairly reflected the ratio at full committee. Now, with Republican candidates obtaining nearly 50 percent of the vote nationally, we are being denied one assignment on each of five subcommittees. A total of five less assignments than fairness demands.

As everyone knows, the subcommittee level is pivotal to the legislative process. It is at this threshold level, that most legislation is really formulated. To deny us full representation at this level is to deny our constituents the full force of their votes.

Mr. Speaker, only this week, the House Republican Conference adopted the following resolution:

Be it Resolved, That the ratio of Republicans to Democrats on all of the Subcommittees of the Standing Committees of the House be no less than the ratio of Republicans to Democrats on the particular Committee;

Of course, the majority faces a burden in filling subcommittee slots that equal their full committee makeup. All but one member of the majority served on our committee in the last Congress and knows we had 18 percent of the legislation in the House referred to us. Important issues are before us; issues that require careful consideration and commitment.

Mr. Speaker, as the ranking minority member on Judiciary I cannot agree to underrepresentation of Republican members on our standing committees. I strongly urge the Democratic leadership to reconsider this ill-advised decision. Fundamental fairness demands no less.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

● Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, last week I reintroduced a bill (H.R. 593) that addresses the real heart of the immigration issue—the lack of opportunities for work in Mexico. Unless there are jobs available in Mexico, it will not matter what kind of immigration control bill the Congress passes in this Congress or in the future.

My bill calls for a mutual, cooperative, coequal venture with the Government of Mexico; this program recognizes the unique and special relationship between our two countries, recognizes our mutual interest, and treats realistically a situation that concerns both countries in a fundamental way.

My bill does not speak to Mexico's problems alone—it also addresses the vast human and economic needs that are going unmet on the United States side of the border. For in truth, huge stretches of the border zone are very much in need of the same kind of assistance required in Mexico. The need does not stop at the border.

My belief is that the United States and Mexico can and must work closely and cooperatively together to meet human and economic needs on both sides of the border. This is the only way to alleviate the greatest single cause of illegal entry into this country, help meet some of the most urgent needs within Mexico, and at the same time provide to realistic program to revive the economically shattered border zone of our own country.

My bill calls for the creation of a joint United States-Mexico development bank. This bank would operate on the same tried, tested, and proven principles of the Inter-American Development Bank, the World Bank, and similar multilateral lending agencies. It would be owned in equal shares by the United States and Mexico, and in every way be a completely mutual institution, dominated by neither side. Its management would be professional, its direction nonpolitical, and its aim strictly to get the maximum economic benefit out of every dollar invested.

The United States-Mexico development bank would have capitalization of 4 billion U.S. dollars, contributed equally by both Governments. The actual paid-in capital would be in the form of callable capital, as in the case of other multilateral development banks. The bank could float securities against the callable capital. Thus, for every $1 actually paid into the bank, the bank could generate 9 dollars' more worth of loanable funds. This is the same financing mechanism that has been used successfully for many years by the multilateral development banks. The result is that for a minimal outlay of Government funds, we can generate a vast amount of private money for bank projects. For a total cash outlay of $400 million—half of which would be contributed by Mexico—there would be $4 billion in loan resources. What is more, additional resources could be created in the same way, yeilding 9 dollars' worth of additional loan money for every dollar actually paid into the bank by the Treasury or by Mexico.

The bank could endeavor to finance economic development in those areas of Mexico that are known to be the main sources of this country's illegal immigrants. However, such targeting is not nearly so important as the fact that jobs must be generated in Mexico—since each job generated in one job less that would need to be sought in this country. Moreover, Mexico is changing rapidly from a rural to an urbanized society, so that the sources of illegal immigation can no longer be presumed to be simply the poor villages; help is needed everywhere in that country.

In the United States, the bank could help finance industry and basic infrastructure requirements along the border region—for example, rebuilding the citrus industry, which was devastated by last winter's freeze, or by financing entry into farming or business by people in that area who are today without jobs, power, or any real hope for a better future.

The need is urgent, because mass unemployment cannot be tolerated on either side of the border. Realistic action is needed, and needed now.

About half of all illegal entrants into this country come from Mexico. During each of the last 5 years of this century, Mexico will need to produce about 1.1 million new jobs, just to take care of labor force growth, but even in its best years, the Mexican economy has never been able to produce more than about half that number. Indeed, even today, the number of new jobs created each year in Mexico falls about 400,000 short of the annual labor force increase. It should startle no one that this shortfall corresponds to the number of illegal Mexican entrants who remain in this country each year. They, in fact, have no other choice.

As long as the Mexican economy fails to produce enough jobs to absorb labor force growth, the already appalling rate of unemployment in that country will continue to grow, and wage rates there will remain desperately low. This mass unemployment leads to social and political chaos, so the outlook clearly is that unless strong action is taken, millions of people in Mexico will have no chance, no hope at all for a decent life, unless they come to the United States. The bilateral bank bill addresses this vast and urgent need for opportunities within Mexico.

Likewise, we must understand the border zone of the United States desperately needs help. The unemployment rate in the border zone is scandalous; there is an immense need to finance development in the border zone. The bilateral development bank, with its ability to operate on both sides of the border in a coordinated way, can help meet the need for decent opportunity. The bank could finance joint water or sewer treatment works; it could finance industrial ventures; or it could finance farm development. With the flexibility it has, the bank could cofinance ventures of any kind with commercial banks or local development authorities—producing very attractive loan rates.

The bilateral development bank would make the maximum use of private capital; like the multilateral banks, it would need very little in the way of actual Government outlays, since only 10 percent of the capital is paid in. The callable capital stays in each Government's Treasury and would only be used to cover outstanding bonds in the event of a total failure by the bank, an event that is extremely unlikely. The bank could make loans at attractive rates, because its bonds would be the highest grade being guaranteed by the callable capital of the bank.

The bilateral development bank addresses the real cause underlying the problem of illegal immigration—which is the desperate need for human opportunity.

The truth is that the recently proposed immigration reform bills solve no problem at all. They do not address the causes of illegal immigration, and therefore cannot even effectively deal with the symptoms.

For example, last year's so-called Simpson-Mazzoli bill would have limited legal immigration from Mexico to about 40,000 immigrants per year. The waiting list for visas in Mexico today is backlogged by 300,000, and the list grows longer with each passing day. Under Simpson-Mazzoli, the backlog of visa applications would have inexorably grown. Since legal immigration is already all but impossible for Mexicans, and would continue to be so, the typical Mexican would continue to have no choice but to enter without legal permission. After all, 14 out of every 15 Mexican visa applicants in line today must expect to wait forever; the only real choice in that kind of situation is to swim the river.

Since the immigration reform bills neither address the cause of illegal immigration nor make it practical for the typical immigrant to enter legally, they are mere exercise in futility. The only realistic thing to do is to work on the basic cause of the problem, rather than to throw up a new paper fence—a paper curtain that would be no more effective in stopping illegal immigration than the so-called tortilla curtain has been.

My bilateral bank proposal is realistic; it is positive; it addresses the real problem; it relies on mechanisms that have been proven over decades, and that have worked throughout the world. It is a program that offers maximum flexibility, that requires very little Government outlays and removes development efforts from the realm of politics—local or international. This is a program that is pragmatic, that will produce results, and that can be put in place quickly, since both the United States and Mexican Governments already have vast experience in and confidence with the techniques and organization involved in the concept. The bilateral development bank recognizes a mutual need, operates on the basis of mutual cooperation, and represents the kind of system in which both Governments can place great confidence, because both Governments already have used the concept for decades with great success.

Today, illegal immigration is seen as a U.S. program with a Mexican solution. But for the Government of Mexico, stopping illegal migration would only exacerbate the already great and rapidly growing problems of poverty and unemployment within the country. On our side of the border, there can be no hope that the immigrant wave can be stopped or even much affected by immigration reform bills that in no way address the root causes of illegal entry, let alone make it possible for legal migration to take place. My bill provides the real solution—a cooperative program that helps both countries solve a problem that vexes and embarrasses both, in a way that is clearly acceptable to both.●

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

LIMITING SUPREME COURT JURISDICTION ON BUSING

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, recently I introduced legislation, H.R. 81, to limit the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and district courts regarding the question of forced busing.

The U.S. Supreme Court handed down a significant decision in Brown against Board of Education in 1954 which declared public school racial segregation unconstitutional. It was almost another decade before the Supreme Court began insisting on serious implementation. This decision was an outstanding example of judicial activism, the Court going beyond legislation to impose its view of what good social policy should be.

My legislation, if passed, will make an exception to the U.S. Constitution. In brief, article III, section 2, clause 2 declares that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction in law and fact but with such exceptions and regulations which Congress might make. The actual citing states:

> In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the Supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all other Cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.

Using this exception, my bill will amend chapter 81 of title 28 of the United States Code. A legislative remedy is necessary because the Federal courts have departed from their traditional role as impersonal interpreters of the law and have become active participants in both legislation and administration. In doing so, they have become part of the bureaucracy rather than an independent part of the Government mediating between other branches.

I believe that our Founding Fathers inserted this exception clause in the Constitution to insure that the will of the majority shall prevail under our system of government. The issue in this particular case is one of freedom, the right to be free from arbitrary, Government-mandated busing of one's children whether he is black or whether he is white. Mandated, forced busing for racial purposes denies citizens the opportunity to go to the school in their local school districts.

Furthermore, the actions of the courts show a strong commitment to forced busing despite overwhelming public opposition, and its record of failure to promote better integrated schools, improved racial relations, or better education. Discrimination should be combated, but court-ordered busing should be curbed. Busing has brought a flight of students from urban schools, and problems for a public school system already under criticism for not meeting the education needs of American students.

"White flight" continues to be an issue in the public school system as whites continue to abandon this system and enroll in private schools. The reason why this trend continues should not be attributed to racism, but rather to the fact that the quality of our educational system has declined. To help rectify the declining quality of education, busing expenditures resulting from transportation costs should be redistributed in the form of teacher salaries and basic programs to improve the education that our children receive.

In summary, busing creates a negative precedent. It reorders the constitutional powers of two of the three branches of Government. It is Congress' inaction that allows this situation to exist. To further familiarize my colleagues with the current busing problem I would like to share the following article by Mr. Ralph McMullan which appeared in the Wall Street Journal on January 21, 1985. After reading this article and examining my legislation, I urge your support of H.R. 81:

THAT BUSING SUCCESS STORY

(By Ralph McMullan)

Charlotte, N.C., was one of the first cities in the country to undergo forced busing. Today, it is often held up as a shining example of how busing can succeed in accomplishing desegregation without lowering the quality of education.

But now, the school-busing issue that so divided my native city and others in the early 1970s is back in the news as the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals prepares to rule soon on the case of Riddick vs. School Board of Norfolk, Va. In an attempt to establish a voluntary system of integration favored by both blacks and whites, Norfolk is working to avoid many of the pitfalls inherent in a mandatory system such as Charlotte's.

This issue involved is almost certain to reach the Supreme Court: Can a school system under a court-ordered busing plan decide on its own to cut back on busing now that it has satisfied the courts that it has desegregated? A group of Norfolk residents has filed suit to prevent the partial dismantling of the forced school-busing plan in effect there. Instead, the school board proposes that elementary schools only adopt a modified "neighborhood" school system to try to end the flight of white children from Norfolk's schools.

SOME SIGNIFICANT LESSONS

Charlotte's history in this issue offers some significant lessons.

When President Reagan visited Charlotte during his reelection campaign, he called court-ordered busing a "social experiment that nobody wants" and one which had "failed."

The response by the local establishment was swift. The Charlotte Observer, the area's largest paper, fired an editorial salvo, later reprinted in the Washington Post, entitled "You Were Wrong, Mr. President." It stated that Charlotte's "proudest achievement is its fuly integrated public school system . . . born out of a bitter controversy" and declared that Charlotte's school system "has blossomed into one of the nation's finest. Supporters of forced busing to achieve racial balance have for years proudly cited Charlotte as an example of where busing worked. But how necessary was busing in Charlotte and what is the bottom line when its costs and benefits are balanced against each other?

I believe that the relative success of the busing experiment in Charlotte stems from the positive racial attitudes held by citizens of Charlotte rather than from the practice of forced busing itself. Many residents here have always been uncomfortable with segregation. In the early 1960s, most civic leaders pushed for voluntary, gradual integration when confronted with the problem of how to end the system of segregated schools. Before the decision requiring forced busing, Charlotte was slowly but surely integrating.

Around 1965 the community eradicated the practice of assigning black students to all-black schools, called "union schools." It was replaced by a system making pupil assignment dependent on geographical location supplemented by a freedom-of-choice option. Under this scheme all students could transfer to any school they wanted if they could furnish their own transportation and space in the school was available.

By 1969, there were only eight schools out of 106 in the system that were not integrated in some manner. Out of a total of more than 20,000 black students, the number attending integrated schools had increased from a few dozen in 1964 to nearly 10,000 in 1969. This system satisfied the then federal district court judge for Charlotte, Braxton Craven, when legal action was first filed against the school board. Because of the steps already taken, no federal remedies were prescribed.

However, this didn't satisfy Julius Chambers, a local civil-rights attorney, who had pressed for further judicial relief in 1968. The rest is history. James McMillan, the new federal court judge, required forced busing to achieve racial balance in Charlotte-Mecklenburg schools in the fall of 1970. The Supreme Court unanimously upheld his decision.

Opposition mounted to the order. Most community leaders did not support forced busing. Many whites fought it because they felt educational standards would decline with the chaos forced busing would cause. Many blacks also opposed it because they realized a greater percentage of blacks than whites had to be bused to meet the required racial quotas. Violence and riots erupted, causing academic test scores to sag. Even the Charlotte Observer reported, "The anti-busing furor create(d) a highly charged atmosphere. . . . Racial tension within the schools became a fact of life in Charlotte." This grim condition continued until at least 1975.

After the initial struggle to overthrow court-ordered busing, a sense of futility set in. Once people knew that busing was here to stay, they accepted the verdict reluctantly and resigned to adapting to a difficult situation. In 1973, a coalition of black parents and white parents formed the Citizens Advisory Group to insure that the desegregation plans mandated by the federal courts would be applied equitably. The school board initiated various educational programs to improve the quality of education for all students.

Jane Scott, a former member of the Charlotte-Mecklenburg School Board and an opponent of forced busing, says: "Once the Supreme Court ruled that we had to implement 'busing,' I and many others did all we could to assure that the school assignments would be as equitable as possible. . . . The children had come first." Because of leaders like these, Charlotte managed to cope with the situation.

Despite the efforts of residents to make their school system work, evidence exists that many whites abandoned the public schools and that white flight is continuing. Since substantial integration had occurred prior to court-ordered busing, it is fair to assume that this white flight cannot be attributed to latent racism, but to a decline in educational quality. From 1972 to 1982, 12% of the white students left the public-school system. Enrollments are still declining despite continued population growth. If present trends continue, by 1995 the white school population will have declined almost 25%.

Thirty-four private schools now serve Charlotte and surrounding Mecklenburg county. Almost every one was established after 1968. Neighboring county school systems and nearby South Carolina school districts have grown rapidly in the past 10 years because of their proximity to Charlotte. One public-school official believes that many of Charlotte's "best and brightest students" have been lost to the private schools and that increases in private-school enrollment are directly related to forced busing.

Racial quotas are still required in some areas of school life, such as in the election of cheerleaders and school officers. Apparently, despite a decade of busing, protection by quota is still thought necessary to ensure that some blacks will be elected to leadership posts by the white majority.

An analysis of test-score statistics published in 1981 indicates that 10 years of busing have not succeeded in narrowing the educational gap between blacks and whites. Jane Scott, commenting on these scores in testimony before the Senate Subcommittee of Separation of Powers, contended that, "In virtually every category, the differential in the black and white scores is greater now" than when busing was ordered by the federal courts.

Since court-ordered busing was initiated in 1970, constant pupil reassignment has been necessary to maintain racial balance in the schools. The school board has had to adjust the assignment plan 11 times. This need to rework the plan has occurred because parents are reluctant to send their children to schools they consider inferior. Jay Robinson, the present school superintendent, believes that although racism may be a factor, concern for a child's education is the major reason. He says, "The one thing about pupil-assignment plans that has never worked in sending children from more affluent neighborhoods into lower income or deprived communities in the lower grades." This constant reshuffling has weakened many parents' commitment to the public-school system and caused them to opt for private schools.

TEST SCORES IMPROVE

Despite these problems, bright spots have appeared. Test scores rating student academic achievement have begun to rise after a significant plunge during the earlier years of busing. Although some critics have charged that a change in the type of test used caused the higher scores, school administrators believe better teaching methods and programs are the cause.

Scholastic Aptitude Tests (SAT) scores for Charlotte show encouraging results when measured against the same scores throughout the state. In 1983-84, Charlotte-Mecklenburg students averaged a combined score of 855—42 points below the national average but 28 points above North Carolina's average.

However, many Charlotteans still do not believe that a forced bus ride fosters learning, though the school board here has not chosen the voluntary approach being attempted in Norfolk. To be sure, Charlotte's experience has not been as traumatic as those of Boston and other cities. But even Julius Chambers and other supporters of forced busing concede that educational quality has suffered because of it.●

THE 20TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE GREATEST HIGH SCHOOL BASKETBALL GAME

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, since the early 1960's, DeMatha Catholic High School of Hyattsville, MD, has enrolled talented basketball players that were born and raised in the District of Columbia. I need not go through a long list of Washingtonians who have become All-Metropolitan and All-American through the DeMatha program. Nonetheless, there are, and always will be, Washingtonians.

Today, Mr. Speaker, is the 20th anniversary of the "greatest high school basketball game ever played." This historic game was played between DeMatha and Power Memorial Academy of New York, Kareem Abdul-Jabbar's alma mater. Under the leadership of Coach Morgan Wooten, DeMatha defeated Power Memorial 46 to 43 and ended Powers' 71 game winning streak which was the second longest in high school history. Due to that victory, the entire DeMatha team was enshrined in the Basketball Hall of Fame in Springfield, MA.

Four of the starting five on the DeMatha team were from the District of Columbia and one was from Maryland. All four from the District of Columbia went on to become All-American in college and are successful professionals today. They are: Bob Whitmore, Notre Dame University, lawyer; Bernard Williams, LaSalle University, sales executive; Ernie Austin, Syracuse University, fast food restaurant operator; and Sid Catlee, Notre Dame University, government relations specialist.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate DeMatha, Coach Wooten, and that historic team not only for winning that great game 20 years ago, but also for their continued success.●

ATTACK PAPERWORK BURDEN FORCED UPON THE ELDERLY

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which represents the first step in reducing the tremendous paperwork burden which our elderly citizens face in order to receive Government benefits and services.

This paperwork burden is a serious problem. A recent survey by my staff revealed that there are at least 12 different Social Security forms which are required for benefits. Some of these include:

Application for mother's or father's insurance benefits; application for retirement insurance benefits; application for wife's or husband's insurance benefits; application for parent's insurance benefits; application for lump sum death benefit; application for widows or widowers insurance benefits; application for supplemental security income; application for medical insurance; application for hospital insurance; application for health insurance under Medicare for individual with chronic renal disease; and patient's request for Medicare payment.

While an elderly beneficiary does not necessarily have to fill out each of these forms for benefits, it seems reasonable to expect that some consolidation and simplification of the information collected by these forms could occur.

The Veterans' Administration requires separate application forms for burial benefits, burial flags, headstone and burial markers, and death pensions. One would expect that each of these benefits would be needed by a survivor at about the same time. Why then, should he or she be asked to complete four different forms which request similar information? This is a tremendous waste of energy on the part of both the VA employee and the beneficiary, not to mention a waste of taxpayer dollars.

The legislation that I am introducing today orders the Department of Health and Human Services to study duplicative information collection and recommend ways in which to reduce it. The Department is already under court order to simplify Medicare information and forms for seniors and this project could be an expansion of that effort to other programs utilized by seniors.

This simplification effort has worked in the past. The Internal Revenue Service developed the "EZ 1040 short form" after recognizing and researching the needs of middle- and low-income taxpayers. This revised form contains only 11 lines.

In order to develop the form, the IRS interviewed taxpayers in the under $50,000 income group. Numerous graphic and design changes were recommended to simplify existing forms. In early 1982, the Commissioner of IRS pressed the staff to develop a new, short form that the majority of middle- and low-income taxpayers could use. During the 1982 tax season, over 15 milion people used the EZ form 1040 and it was the top choice for single taxpayers with incomes under $50,000 whose income was only from salaries, wages and tips.

If we in Congress can provide this kind of leadership in other areas of the Federal Government which collect information, we can institute the same kind of rational and much-needed change that will provide direct and tangible relief to our senior citizens.

The study requires no additional funds and directs the Department of Health and Human Services to use up to $100,000 of its existing revenues to conduct the survey. The study shall be conducted within a year of enactment of this bill and a report to Congress, with recommendations, must be provided within 90 days after completion of the study.

As an original member of the Select Committee on Aging, I have long been concerned about the confusing, duplicative forms which the elderly must complete. I believe that this study will be the first and important step in a major, Government-wide campaign to free the elderly from tremendous and unnecessary paperwork requirements.

In the 98th Congress, this bill enjoyed the bipartisan support of 51 of my colleagues. I hope that many more will join me this session in support of this initiative.

The text of the legislation follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall conduct a study on the collection by the Department of Health and Human Services of information from individuals, such as information collected through written report forms and application forms, to determine what information is being collected from the same class of individuals more than once. The Secretary shall study in particular the information required in forms that elderly persons must complete in order to receive Federal benefits under the jurisdiction of such Department.

SEC. 2. The Secretary shall complete the study not later than the end of the first fiscal year beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act and shall report to Congress not later than 90 days after completion of the study. The report shall include detailed recommendations for collecting information more efficiently and reducing information collection that is duplicative. The Secretary may use not more than $100,000 of funds appropriated after the date of the enactment of this Act to conduct the study.●

IMPORTED GOODS AND THE ECONOMY

HON. DOUGLAS APPLEGATE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring before my colleagues in the House a matter of great concern to me and of growing concern to this Congress and Nation. Imported goods, particularly steel, have played economic havoc with many of our basic industries over the past several years. It has taken the Federal Government a long time to recognize this but some progress has been made over the years to restrain imports to varying degrees.

Two years ago, we passed the most far reaching buy American legislation in the past 50 years. In the last two Congresses, the House passed domestic auto content legislation which, unfortunately, did not clear the Senate. Legislation mandating country of origin labels on certain textile products was also passed. And with steel, too, legislation has passed that, if properly enforced, will lend itself to restricting unfair imports.

Last year, the International Trade Commission found that imports were, in fact, coming into this country to the degree that they hurt the domestic industry and were deemed to be unfair. Recommendations were made to the President in order to reverse that trend, but they were rejected in favor of voluntary trade restraints that were to be negotiated with the individual steel exporting nations.

I am pleased that, with the exception of the countries of Japan and South Korea, these trade pacts have been negotiated and are in place and working. I and my colleagues who represent steel-producing areas trust that this administration will vigorously enforce these agreements in an effort to give the American steel industry the breathing room it needs to once again establish itself as a leader. Further, I call on the administration to persist in their efforts to establish trade agreements with Japan and South Korea, two nations that have illegally dumped steel on our shores. I do not doubt that this will be a tough pill for these nations to swallow and, as such, may reject any proposal. If so, it will be incumbent on the Reagan administration to force the issue and use whatever means available in order to reach an accord.

While this has always been a primary concern of mine, steel imports is one that has taken on increased significance with me of late as a major employer in my district, Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel, one of if not the most modern steel producing facilities in the country, finds itself on the verge of eonomic collapse. It is important to note that this company's financial plight is not the result of a lack of modernization, high employee wages, as the workers have already taken several wage and benefit concessions, or ineffective management. The bottom line to their problem is the marketplace which has been taken over by imported products. It is vital to point out, too, that Wheeling-Pittsburgh is not alone in this quagmire. It clearly points out the absolute necessity for strong and decisive action in controlling imports.●

TAX DEDUCTIONS FOR ANTI-CRIME GROUPS

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today to allow taxpayers to deduct contributions to community anti-crime groups, even if the taxpayers do not itemize.

The rate of serious crime has increased by 200 percent in the past two decades. In 1983, almost 37 million Americans were victims of crime. 23,000 citizens die each year as the result of crime, and many times that number are injured. The 98th Congress enacted major legislation designed to crack down on crime, including stiffer sentencing requirements and closer parole monitoring. State and local governments have also been devoting increased attention to the growing crime problem.

However, each day's news brings stories about ordinary citizens who feel so unsafe on our cities' streets and subways that they arm themselves in self-defense. Recently, a New York City grand jury failed to press assault charges against Bernhard Goetz, who allegedly shot four youths who harassed him on the subway. City residents applauded Goetz's actions.

Other citizens have taken more responsible self-help measures. More and more frequently, members of our urban communities are joining together to fund community crime patrols and crime-prevention groups. Individual contributions to support these groups can range anywhere from $5 to $10 to several hundred dollars a year. For many low- and middle-income families, these contributions consitute a major expense.

By allowing nonitemizers to deduct their contributions to crime-prevention organizations, my legislation alleviates the financial burden that the less affluent face in their efforts to protect their homes and their persons. In addition, it encourages a spirit of self-help and community cooperation, which will make our neighborhoods both more secure and more pleasant. I urge all of my colleagues to join with me in support of this legislation to enable citizens to help themselves in a responsible and communitarian manner.

H.R. 840

A bill to clarify the law by explicitly providing that nonprofit community crime prevention organizations and crime victim assistance organizations are organizations operated for charitable purposes within the meaning of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. NONPROFIT COMMUNITY CRIME PREVENTION AND CRIME VICTIM ASSISTANCE ORGANIZATIONS ARE ORGANIZATIONS OPERATED FOR CHARITABLE PURPOSES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 501 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to exemption from tax on corporations, certain trusts, etc.) is amended by redesignating subsection (m) as subsection (n) and by inserting after subsection (l) the following new subsection:

"(m) CHARITABLE PURPOSES INCLUDE COMMUNITY CRIME PREVENTION AND CRIME VICTIM ASSISTANCE.—For purposes of this title—

"(1) the purpose of providing patrols or surveillance to detect criminal acts within any community (or any part of such community) and reporting such acts to law enforcement officers,

"(2) the purpose of providing assistance or counseling to individuals who are the victims of criminal acts or victims of particular types of criminal acts,

"(3) the purpose of providing counseling or instruction relating to the prevention or detection of criminal activity, including instruction in methods of self-defense, and

AN HONORED VETERAN

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of the House, the death of an honored veteran of the Korean conflict who spent over 3 years as a prisoner of the Chinese, the longest period of captivity suffered by any soldier from my State during the conflict.

I speak of Thaddeus Novobilski of Simpson, PA, who died last November 16 in the Veterans' Administration hospital at Wilkes-Barre, PA. Injuries suffered during his captivity were a factor in his death.

Mr. Novobilski was a member of the Army's famed 24th Infantry Division in occupied Japan when, on June 27, 1950, he was ordered to Korea.

He was wounded and captured by enemy forces at Chochiwan, Korea, on July 11, 1950, and spent the following 1,140 days in captivity.

Mr. Novobilski was a member of the Disabled American Veterans, the American Legion and American Ex-Prisoners of War. He was employed as a welder by the Doyle & Roth Co., of Simpson, PA, and was a member of St. Michael's Church of Simpson.

My condolences go out to his brothers, Stanley, Donald, and Edward Bognatz, and to his sisters, Mrs. Joseph Szymaszek and Mrs. Rosemary Sefchik.●

CONFIDENTIALITY OF MEDICAL AND DENTAL RECORDS

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, recently I introduced legislation, H.R. 74, to provide for the confidentiality of medical and dental records of patients not receiving assistance from the Federal Government. This bill would prohibit Federal agencies and their employees from acquiring and/or inspecting medical and dental records without the express written authorization of the patients.

H.R. 74 is a necessary legislative remedy due to several documented cases where Government research has used the private medical files of individuals. The individual's names and ailments were disclosed publically, without obtaining prior consent.

As provided by the Bill of Rights, the protection against the invasion of privacy is inherent in our Constitution. The first amendment allows the right to speak freely to one's doctor. The fourth amendment recognizes the right to be secure against searches and seizures of personal records and the fifth amendment acknowledges that we need not testify against ourself openly or vis-a-vis medical records. It is unconstitutional to allow an individual's rights to be superseded by the needs of the Government or public.

Moreover, when this issue was considered in the past, doctors testified that they felt a reluctance to complete medical files due to a fear of violating their Hippocratic oath. This unrecorded information, known only to the personal doctor, could then be lost to a subsequent treating physician. Patients have also testified to withholding information from their doctor fearing that their ailments may later be open to the scrutiny of Federal agents.

Furthermore, due to the recent computerization of medical and dental files on the part of hospitals and doctors, accessibility of personal information has greatly increased. Not only is the Government and it's Federal agencies interested in these files, but there are documented cases where insurance agencies and employers have utilized them to discriminate against potential customers and employees. This fear of disclosure is a practice that must be halted. It is for this reason that I introduced H.R. 74. I ask and welcome my colleagues to join me in this endeavor by cosponsoring this legislation.●

GENTLE BEN SHANBERG

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, January 18, 1985, a very good personal friend of mine, a retired painter and union organizer, and a very great friend and member of the Democratic Party, Benjamin Shanberg, died at the age of 77 in Veterans Hospital in Buffalo, NY, after a brief illness.

I first met Ben in 1970 when I made my initial bid for public office. In all the years since, I have never met a more dedicated friend or supporter.

Ben was a native of Cleveland, who moved to Massachusetts where he graduated from Springfield High School. He then served in the U.S. Army in Europe during World War II, and was wounded twice in the Battle of the Bulge. For that he was awarded the Purple Heart and the Oak Leaf Cluster.

In 1946 Ben came to Buffalo where he started his own painting business, the Spic & Span Co. He soon became involved in Democratic politics, becoming a committeeman for the Erie County Democratic Committee for 25 years. He was especially active over those 25 years in the town of Tonawanda Democratic Committee, where he served not only as a committeeman, but as an executive board member and assistant sergeant-at-arms. Above and beyond that, he was an officer and cofounder of the Over 50 Club of Kenmore-Town of Tonawanda, life member of the Roll of Honor of the Disabled American Veterans Chapter 120 of Kenmore and a member of the Painter's Union of Buffalo Local No. 43.

Ben is survived by his lovely wife, the former Louise M. Gugino, who truly was his partner, in every sense of the word, in all his personal, political, and professional endeavors. He also has two surviving and lovely daughters, Mary Ann Bolles of Buffalo and Barbara H. Shanberg of California. He is also survived by his brother, Maurice, of Washington, DC, and two grandchildren.

On Thursday, January 24, 1985, the Tonawanda News published an editorial that summed up the feelings of the entire community toward Ben. In particular, they said: "His death last weekend marked the end of a distinguished career of community service. His voice in town affairs and his frequent letters to the editor will be missed."

Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert the entire editorial from the Tonawanda News, entitled "Gentle Ben":

GENTLE BEN

For more than a quarter century, Benjamin Shanberg was a community activist and strident Democrat in Town of Tonawanda and Erie County circles.

In an overwhelmingly Republican town, a minority voice sometimes can get discouraged. That was never the case with Ben and his wife, Louise, who toiled so long for the Democratic Party and he carried his message of minority representation long, yet firmly and respectfully.

Mr. Shanberg was a member of the town committee executive board and was its assistant sergeant-at-arms. He was a co-founder of the Over 50 Club of Kenmore-Town of Tonawanda.

His pinnacle of community service was reached when he was a national organizer for the 1981 Solidarity Day which brought 750,000 persons to rallies in Washington.

The self-employed painter distinguished himself in World War II where he was wounded twice and received the Purple Heart and Oak Leaf Cluster.

His death last weekend marked the end of a distinguished career of community service. His voice in town affairs and his frequent letters to the editor will be missed.●

MRS. BRUNA ODELLO—WOMAN OF THE YEAR

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be able to inform my colleagues that Mrs. Bruna Odello has been named "Woman of the Year" by the Quota Club of Monterey and Pacific Grove, CA.

Mr. Odello has received this designation because of her selfless civic involvement and her dedication to helping those around her. Her active involvement in countless civic organizations has made her the indispensable woman in our area. Just a brief list of the organizations and other civic efforts in which she participates should give you an idea of why she has received this honor.

Coastal Planning Commission;
Environmental Health Commission;
Voting Election Board;
Carmel Foundation;
Civic Club;
Monarch Pines Senior Citizens Mobile Home Park;
Carmel Convalescent Hospital Volunteer Feeding Program;
Bing Crosby Golf Tournament and the U.S. Open; Girl Scouts; and Monterey History and Art Association.

In addition to these many activities, Mrs. Odello has worked extensively in projects involving the Carmel Mission. Among other things, she is a past president of the Mothers' Club and an active member of the Altar Society, and has been head of the Cursillo committee, chairman of the Annual Fiesta Committee, director of European Pilgrimage Tours, assistant in the Junipero Serra School programs, a teacher of religious education classes, a counselor and advisor in the Christian Youth Club, and a participant in the organized widows and widowers support group at MacMahon Center.

Mrs. Odello was born in Italy and moved to the United States when she was 3 years old. She moved to the Monterey Peninsula in 1947. She and her late husband Emilio had two daughters, Pamela and Carla, both of whom live on the Monterey Peninsula. The Odellos have been artichoke farmers for several decades, and Mrs. Odello's dedication to the land has led to her involvement with the Carmel Coastal Commission's land use activities and her donation of property to Carmel as a wildlife refuge.

Mr. Speaker, rarely does a person dedicate herself so completely to the well-being of her fellow citizens. Mrs. Odello's contributions to a better life for the people of Monterey Peninsula, and to the very special environment of this beautiful area, have earned her the title of "Woman of the Year." It is a title that is richly deserved. I know my colleagues join me in congratulating Mrs. Odello.●

CRIME VICTIMS TO DEDUCT MEDICAL EXPENSES WITHOUT 5 PERCENT FLOOR

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today to allow crime victims to deduct medical expenses incurred as a result of crime without regard to the usual 5 percent floor on this deduction. My bill would also allow crime-related medical expenses to be deducted by nonitemizers.

Serious crime—murder, rape, arson, assault, robbery, and burglary—affects 1 out of every 10 households in this country each year. The rate of serious crime has increased by 200 percent in the past two decades to the point where almost 37 million Americans were crime victims in 1983—23,000 citizens die as the result of crime each year and many times that number are injured. The expenses associated with crime-inflicted injury can be as crippling as the injury itself. This legislation would substantially ease this financial burden.

The 98th Congress enacted major legislation designed to crack down on crime, including stiffer sentencing requirements and closer parole monitoring. However, since only 5 percent of all crimes committed fall under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, the impact that Congress can have through that kind of legislation is limited. In addition, that legislation focuses only on deterring the criminal. Increasingly, we are becoming aware that we must also concentrate our efforts on helping the victims of crime.

Allowing victims to deduct crime-related medical expenses from their taxes is an important step toward a crime policy which not only punishes the criminal but also helps the victim. By allowing nonitemizers to deduct their crime-related medical expenses, my legislation assists all victims of crime, regardless of their income level. Moreover, this tax deduction provides a means for Congress to alleviate the hardship suffered by crime victims no matter whether these crimes fall under Federal or State jurisdiction. I urge all of my colleagues to join with me in support of this legislation which takes a real step toward alleviating the suffering of our citizens who are victims of crime.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

H.R. 841

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subsection (a) of section 213 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to medical, dental, etc., expenses) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—That shall be allowed as a deduction the following amounts, not compensated for by insurance or otherwise—

"(1) the amount by which the expenses paid during the taxable year (reduced by any amount deductible under paragraph (2)) for medical care of the taxpayer, his spouse, and dependents (as defined in section 152) exceeds 5 percent of adjusted gross income, and

"(2) the crime-related medical expenses paid during the taxable year."

(b)(1) Subsection (d) of section 213 of such Code is amended by redesignating paragraphs (4), (5), and (6) as paragraphs (5), (6), and (7), respectively, and by inserting after paragraph (3) the following new paragraph:

"(4) CRIME-RELATED MEDICAL EXPENSES.—The term 'crime-related medical expenses' means amounts paid for medical care of the taxpayer, his spouse, or a dependent if such care is for an injury (or other condition) resulting from the act of another person which is punishable as a crime under Federal, State, or local law."

(2) Paragraph (6) of section 213(d) of such Code (as redesignated by paragraph (1)) is amended by striking out "paragraph (2)" and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraph (5)".

(c) Section 62 of such Code (defining adjusted gross income) is amended by inserting after paragraph (16) the following new paragraph:

"(17) CRIME-RELATED MEDICAL EXPENSES.—The deduction allowed by section 213 for crime-related medical expenses paid during the taxable year."

(d) The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1984.●

STARVATION: YET ANOTHER SOVIET MODUS OPERANDI

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, recent events in Marxist Ethiopia have brought to light but another of the diabolical methods which the Soviet Union and its Third World proxies routinely employ to maintain absolute subjugation over their own citizens. A 6,000-ton food shipment from Australia that had been intended for the starving famine victims in rebel-held areas was impounded by Ethiopian officials. The ostensible justification for the seizure was that Australia was trying to infringe on Ethiopian sovereignty. What this amounts to, however, is nothing more than a despicable attempt to starve those unfortunate enough to live in Eritrea and Tigre into submission. To use this horrible famine for political purposes shocks the conscience of civilized people throughout the world.

But this type of behavior is nothing new, and comes as no surprise to those who have bothered to observe Soviet policies over the years. The Ukrainian Famine of 1933 in which an estimated 7.9 million Ukrainians died after the Soviets confiscated their grain and destroyed their stores of food is perhaps the most stunning example of the use of starvation as a political tool. But it is far from unique. In Afghanistan the Soviets have systematically destroyed the agricultural base of the country. Not only have the Soviets resorted to carpet bombing of villages, but after such a bombing troops will enter the village and burn any crops that have survived. Grain stocks are carried away and livestock are exterminated, leaving the villagers to face a winter without food and little expectation of getting any.

And yet here, little is said about the use of starvation as political tool. Many seem to even ignore it. It is our duty, though, to denounce what has happened in the strongest possible terms, and to expose to close scrutiny the true nature of those who formulate Soviet policy. The more costly this type of deplorable activity becomes for the Soviets and their cronies in terms of prestige and influence among developing countries, the less likely its is that it will be used.

A recent editorial from the Wall Street Journal provides some salient insights into this problem, and I recommend that my colleagues take a few moments to read what it has to say.

The article follows:

FAMINE-BUSTING

Forget the Malthusian claptrap about overpopulation and exhausted soil. The worst famines in the world today are political. They have become a weapon in the Soviet Union's attempt to control its Third World proxy empire.

Partly out of urgent humanitarian considerations and partly to contain a new and particularly devilish twist to Soviet imperialism, the U.S. is in need of better techniques to get food to starving people. Finding ways to counter the political use of starvation by the Soviets and their Third World puppet governments would not only save lives but might help improve Third World estimates of America's political effectiveness.

Evidence of the Soviet strategy is by now compelling. The most appalling example is Ethiopia, where the Russians and their stooges in the Ethiopian government are actually thwarting shipments of food to starving people not under government military control—even though rebel movements have asked for a "food truce." The government's "relief effort" consists of a "resettlement program" designed mainly for population control that consumes thousands of truck and helicopter hours urgently needed to transport grain.

Free-lance journalist Gail Smith reported late last week on interviews with refugees who recently escaped from the Asosa resettlement center in Ethiopia to Sudan's Blue Nile province. They said that 4,000 people had died at the Asosa camp in one month and that Ethiopian soldiers killed 330 trying to escape.

Less ghastly but more indicative of Soviet strategy are reports from Afghan refugees that the Soviet invaders are now systematically destroying the country's agriculture. Interviews conducted by the Peshawar-based Afghan Information Center show a common pattern: After heavy bombardment, Soviet troops will enter a village, carry away its grain stocks, exterminate cattle and poultry, and blow up the karez, the central underground irrigation canal. The Russians were cheated of an Afghanistan famine this year by good crop weather. But pockets of hunger have developed in areas of heavy fighting such as Herat, next to Iran.

Traditional relief efforts are not doing the job. A government trying to starve its own people isn't about to help the U.N. or Western charities ship them food. We've already heard too many stories of massive grain shipments rotting on the docks in Ethiopia while anguished relief officials, reluctant to jeopardize their access to the country, join the diplomatic dissembling about the host government's real motives. More help comes from backdoor shipments such as the aid apparently now reaching rebel-held Ethiopia through the Sudan.

Some relief workers in Afghanistan are studying ways to dispense with traditional bureaucratic distribution systems. A famine, they argue, almost never starts with an absence of food; it comes from a market distortion. A crop failure runs up the price of grain and depresses the price of livestock. Peasants sell herds they can't afford to feed, glutting the market and further reducing their income. At the same time, grain merchants hold their goods from the rising grain market, waiting for the prices to run up even further. Starving comes when peasants run out of money for food.

The quickest way to break this cycle is not to import a massive aid bureaucracy but to break the market expectations. Flood the open market with enough grain to stabilize the price and hoarding will no longer pay. Local reserves will be released. Even with its horrors of starvation, say relief workers, Tigre province in Ethiopia still holds reserves of 15,000 to 20,000 tons of grain, enough to feed it for a year.

Traditional relief abhors this strategy, of course. It involves releasing grain with a minimum of restrictions, in effect co-opting the black market. But the grain already being diverted through the black market from the official aid to Ethiopia is all that is saving some people in rebel-held areas.

Will the imports reach the poorest and most vulnerable people? That is a welfare question to be dealt with after the initial emergency effort to break the hoarding cycle. But local charities have been working with that problem for years, through nationalist relief societies or mosques.

U.S. "P.L. 480" food relief efforts often fail to take sufficient account of local market forces. If U.S. surpluses are dumped on a local economy in too large a quantity and at the wrong time, the resulting price drop can drive local farmers out of business. Grain dumping to break a famine market needs to be strictly short-term and carefully calibrated not to drive the price below the profit margin necessary to get local farmers back on their feet.

The West may soon have a good testing ground for improved strategies in the Sudan, where waves of Ethiopian refugees, now crossing at the rate of 3,500 a day, may soon give us two famines for the price of one. The price of sorghum, the Sudanese staple, tripled last year and hoarding against further increases has already been reported.

The first necessity for the U.S. is to loudly condemn starvation politics. The second is to gain some understanding of how to put the market to use in relief efforts. These efforts should be backed with some real political muscle. It's time to drop the Malthusian claptrap and get down to cases.●

A TRIBUTE TO W. CARY EDWARDS

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to proudly pay tribute to a fellow New Jerseyite, an outstanding public servant and a good friend, W. Cary Edwards.

On February 2, Cary Edwards will be honored for his achievements and service to the Garden State and its citizens. A career with as many accomplishments as his is indeed worthy of recognition, and is truly special given Cary's relatively short time in State government.

How many public officials can claim in one decade to have served their community on the borough council, been elected three times to the New Jersey General Assembly, and in that brief time as a lawmaker, been chosen by his colleagues to serve as assistant minority leader, been selected as one of the 10 outstanding legislators, and, most recently, been asked to serve in the Governor's cabinet as chief counsel. The answer, we know, is that very, very few individuals can match the outstanding career that Cary Edwards has already established.

It is too easy to highlight Cary's work by simply listing his many awards and accomplishments: Student with a full academic scholarship; law school graduate; university instructor and an assistant dean; expert in municipal law; and citizen of the year awards.

That is the abbreviated list and it tells only a small part of the story.

Cary is indeed a rare person. He has demonstrated versatility, and above all, an outstanding ability to deal with people of all persuasions and problems at all levels.

To make an analogy, Cary Edwards is the Joe DiMaggio of New Jersey—he can hit, he can run, and he can throw. We, in the Garden State, are especially fortunate to have Cary Edwards on our team. And I'm sure I speak for all when I say we expect many more championship seasons for New Jersey with Cary in the batting order. Mr. Speaker, I ask the House of Representatives to join in honoring my colleague, W. Cary Edwards, a truly special New Jerseyite.●

RELIEF FOR MADAM ANNE BRUSSELMANS

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednsday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a private bill for the relief of Madam Anne Brusselmans. By means of background, Madam Brusselmans, a native of Belgium is an 80-year-old heroine of World War II who was instrumental in saving the lives of hundreds of American allied airmen who parachuted into Nazi-occupied Belgium territory.

To her credit she has been awarded the Medal of Freedom with silver palm, Medal of Freedom from the U.S. War Department, Polish Medal of Resistance, an Order of the British Empire and numerous citations.

The need for this legislation stems from the fact that Madam Brusselmans' previous application to obtain U.S. permanent resident status has been denied because of her failure to fit into any of the six preference classes established by the Department of State. These are: First preference, unmarried sons and daughters of U.S. citizens; second preference, spouses and unmarried sons and daughters of aliens lawfully admitted for permanent residence; third preference, members of the professions or persons of exceptional ability in the sciences and arts; fourth preference, married sons and daughters of U.S. citizens; fifth preference, brothers and sisters of U.S. citizens; sixth preference, skilled and unskilled workers in short supply; and nonpreference, other immigrants.

I have been contacted by airmen groups—that is. Association of Air Force Prisoners of War—on behalf of Madam Brusselmans who have offered their strong support with regard to her obtaining U.S. permanent resident status.

Another reason I have taken this unusual step is because of the fact that Madam Brusselmans has suffered a number of major setbacks in her health. For several years she has been afflicted with a chronic case of phlebitis where she has lately been confined to a wheelchair. Presently she is undergoing physical therapy but still must use a wheelchair.

Her family is desirous of having her remain in the United States because of her health, and the fact that her daughter and grandson are the only family she has in the United States with the exception of her son, who is a doctor residing in Brussels, Belgium.

Madam Brusselmans has demonstrated a love for this Nation and her people through her heroic work during World War II. The achievement of permanent resident status would represent the fulfillment of a lifelong dream for her, and I would like to help her in this worthy cause. I hope this legislation can gain early and favorable consideration.●

RETURN TO THE GOLD STANDARD

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, if we are to revitalize our Nation's economy, we must remove from Government the temptation and the ability to produce chronic budget deficits. Restoration of a dependable monetary standard based on a commodity with fixed value would, by making monetization impossible, accomplish this. For this reason, I have introduced H.R. 69, a bill to provide that all Federal Reserve notes and other currencies of the United States shall be redeemable in gold.

In the constitutional debates in Philadelphia the monetary standard of the United States was a matter of central consideration. Article I, sections 8, 9, and 10 provides unequivocably for a monetary standard of gold and silver. Not until 1862, in the midst of the Civil War, did America suspend convertability and begin printing greenbacks. During the Civil War, as a result of the suspension of convertability, price levels tripled. When Congress decided to return to a gold convertible greenback in 1875 to prevent further increases, prices stabilized and inflation ceased to exist.

In the half century that has passed since President Roosevelt ordered that U.S. citizens would not be able to trade dollars for gold, the purchasing power of the dollar has declined significantly while the value of gold in real terms has remained almost constant. In 1928, one could purchase a two door Chevrolet coupe with a rumble seat for $720 or 36 ounces of gold. Thirty six ounces of gold today—at a little over $300 per oz.—will buy two fine Ford Escorts. In 1932 one could buy a fine suit of clothes for $20 or 1 ounce of gold. One ounce of gold will buy you a fine suit today. One ounce of gold in the early depression years would buy you 200 gallons of gasoline at the pump—10 gallons for a dollar. One ounce of gold today—with gasoline at $1.20 per gallon—will buy you 250 gallons of gasoline. While the gold standard is not perfect, its reinstitution in some form would be an improvement over the fiat paper money in circulation since 1933.

The question is not whether it is possible to reestablish the gold standard or whether it is too difficult to do so. But, the practical question: Is it harder to return to a gold standard which worked for over 150 years in America, or is it harder to live with the conditions that have resulted from a reliance on fiat currency—the highest interest rates, the worst inflation, alternating inflation and potential deflation, recessions, and so forth? Not only would a gold backed dollar bring about monetary stabilization and lower interest rates, but it would also help to balance the budget by preventing politicians from overspending and then simply monetizing the debt. It is high time for our currency to once again be as sound as a dollar and the dollar to be as good as gold.●

A PLEDGE OF SUPPORT FOR SOVIET JEWRY

HON. H. JAMES SAXTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pledge my support for the millions of Jews living under oppression in the Soviet Union.

As we all know, the number of Jews allowed to emigrate from the Soviet Union has been reduced to barely a trickle. The recent statement from Moscow that "all the Jews who wanted to leave have already done so" would seem merely absurd if it weren't so cruel. According to the National Conference on Soviet Jewry, at least 350,000 Jews have begun the emigration process. Many have waited years without hearing a word regarding their application, and thousands are hoping to be reunited with family members in the West. These refuseniks" are considered outcasts in the Soviet society and are subject to numerous forms of intimidation by the omnipotent KGB.

Equally as frightening as the withholding of emigration rights and the intimidation of refuseniks is the assault on Jewish culture within the Soviet Union. Recently there has been an increase in the harassment of Hebrew teachers and cultural activists. The upsurge in the number of arrests on false charges of these teachers and activists is evidence of the Soviets' determination to suppress Jewish culture in the Soviet Union.

I call on the Soviet Union to join the family of nations in honoring the Helsinki accords, which guarantee an individual's rights to freedom of religion, cultural practices and emigration—a situation which clearly does not exist in the Soviet Union today.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce this body to the family that I, as the Member from the 13th District of New Jersey, have adopted through the Soviet Jewry Adoption Program. Gennady Feldman and his family first applied to emigrate from the Soviet Union in 1976. As they wait to be allowed to be reunited with Gennady's parents and sister in Israel, the Feldman's will know that we in the West have not forgotten their plight and will not rest until all refuseniks are allowed to emigrate freely.●

SMOKING AND LUNG CANCER

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, the following article, which appeared recently in the Raleigh, NC, News and Observer, illustrates quite clearly that the evidence linking cigarette smoking and lung cancer is far from scientific and conclusive. I commend this article to my colleagues' attention, and ask that it be kept in mind when Congress considers tobacco issues.

CIGARETTE, CANCER LINK FAILS TO APPEAR IN MICE

Inhalation of cigarette smoke by mice did not produce a type of lung cancer cell associated with smoking in humans, according to a nine-year, $12 million study released last week by the Council for Tobacco Research.

The study was the final report of scientists at Microbiological Associates Inc., an independent research company in Bethesda, Md., and was titled "Chronic Exposure of Mice to Cigarette Smoke." The Council for Tobacco Research is an organization of tobacco manufacturers, growers and warehouse operators that sponsors research into health and smoking.

More than 10,000 mice inhaled the smoke from more than 800,000 cigarettes during the study.

The study, released Friday, also found that mice who suffered from chemical-induced lung cancer did not show significantly increased lung cancer when later exposed to long-term cigarette smoke inhalation.

All types of lung tumors identified in the mice occurred at the same frequency in the smoke-exposed mice, in mice treated identically but without smoke exposure, and with control animals, the study said.

The project, at its peak, required about 11,000 animal-related manipulations daily. Scientists performed autopsies on the animals, microscopic examinations of tissues, data evaluation and re-evaluation, and final analyses on each phase of the study.

The animals used were mostly females of inbred mouse strains that were developed to be genetically susceptible to the induction of lung tumors by various cancer-causing chemicals.

The study showed that mice got squamous, or scale-like, cell cancers, a type found in human lung cancer, and other types of lung tumors when pretreated with methylcholanthrene, a potent carcinogen. Daily exposure to smoke did not change the types of methylcholanthrene-induced tumors compared to animals treated identically but without smoke exposure.

The animals who were not exposed to smoke had a higher incidence for all malignant lung tumors than animals given methylcholanthrene and then exposed to smoke.

A comparison of the occurrence of all types of cancers showed a 27 percent incidence for the smoke-exposed groups and a 29 percent incidence for mice treated identically but without smoke exposure.●

FILIPINO JUSTICE

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, the recent indictments issued in the Philippines offer hope that those responsible for the murder of opposition leader Benigno Aquino will be brought to justice.

An editorial in last Friday's Miami Herald provides an excellent analysis of the meaning of these indictments of the future of the Philippines and of United States-Philippine relations. The political and economic trends in the Philippines over the past 15 years have been particularly disheartening. Many of us hope the leadership in that country, as the Miami Herald suggests, has realized the need to reverse these trends.

Many Americans can still recall the close association of United States and Philippines armed forces during World War II when we were united in common purpose. We recall the high international prestige of the Philippines in the post war world, as its distinguished citizens such as Magsaysay and Romulo influenced the course of history in positive ways. Many of us can remember how the Philippines has played a key role in world economic development.

Sadly, recent events in the Philippines have eroded the nation's fine reputation. Hopefully fulfillment of the requirements of justice will mean that the Philippines have turned a corner. I insert the full editorial of the Miami Herald in the RECORD at this point.

The editorial follows:

FILIPINO JUSTICE

The indictment of Gen. Fabian Ver as an accessory in the August 1983 murder of Philippine political-opposition leader Benigno Aquino is supremely welcome. It sustains hope that public faith in the Philippine government may not yet be doomed, and that such faith still may be warranted.

If Filipinos' faith in their government can be sustained, the United States may well avoid a terrible choice between perhaps losing the Philippines as a strategic ally or possibly sending in troops to protect U.S. interests there.

The assassination of Mr. Aquino, in the words of an October 1984 staff report to the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee, was "a potent blow to the Marcos regime's credibility. It has changed the political scene fundamentally. It has galvanized the political center of Philippine society into active opposition . . . and has provided a rallying point for the Left. The government's version of the assassination is not generally believed."

Why should Americans care? Because the Philippines were an American colony in which democracy took successful root until Ferdinand Marcos became a tyrant ruling by force. Because the Philippines occupy a strategic chokehold over vital trade routes to Asia. Because Americans fought World War II in the Pacific to maintain access to that half of the world. Because Clark Air Base and Subic Bay Naval Base there represent irreplaceable U.S. strategic military assets. And because all of that is threatened by political instability, which steadily strengthens a growing Communist insurgency that well might take power if the situation degenerates much more.

In such circumstances, the indictment of 26 people for Mr. Aquino's murder may help immensely. As chief of the armed forces and the right-hand man to President Marcos, General Ver symbolizes the most hated weaknesses of corrupt, authoritarian rule. By indicting one so powerful—along with two colonels, the chief of the elite aviation-security guard, and 14 other soldiers—the government signals loudly its intent to prosecute Mr. Aquino's killers.

Are the Filipino people still listening? Will indictments be followed by convictions and punishments? Will this spawn much-needed political reforms across the board? Can the Philippines' slide toward civil war and anarchy be reversed?

No one yet can answer. All that can be said today is that these indictments are a welcome sign that the Marcos regime recognizes the stakes. May Washington labor tirelessly to assure that this hopeful step is followed by many more.●

EDUCATION REFORM

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, as a historian and former educator, I recognize the need for a strong system of education. However, our current system has failed adequately to educate the youth in our country and has proven to be far inferior to the traditions and standards of the system we had 20 to 30 years ago. Fortunately reform has begun in this area. It must continue to be a top priority for legislators, educators, parents, and simply every American if we are to strengthen our school systems.

Recently, an article by Howard Hurwitz in an October 1984 edition of the New York Tribune, was brought to my attention. It is noteworthy because it summarizes a book entitled "A Blueprint for Education Reform" by the Free Congress Research and Education Foundation. This book was published in an effort to add a new perspective to the national debate on education. It contains 12 chapters by various authors on topics such as parents' rights, plurism, discipline, teachers training, and citizenship. These authors all share a strong interest in the national debate over education reform. Furthermore, they are from diverse professions. The list of authors include lawyers, scholars, parents, businessmen, and teachers. In addition to their remarks, an overview by the President of the United States is included.

While I support some of the suggestions more than others, I strongly recommend that this article and book be read by everyone who wishes to improve our current system of education. I would like to share with and commend to my colleagues' attention the article by Mr. Hurwitz, which follows:

[From the New York Tribune, October 1984]

A CORNUCOPIA OF IDEAS ON WHAT'S WRONG WITH AMERICAN EDUCATION

(By Howard Hurwitz)

Education reform is a hot issue in American politics. The 12 contributors—lawyers, government staff and educators—to A Blueprint for Education Reform put the feet of public school "monopolists" to the fire. They toast, too, private school proponents when they do not toe the conservative line.

The most fiery of the smoldering papers contained in this blueprint is held by Lawrence Uzzell, who had the guts to resign from a cushy job at the Education Department (ED) when he concluded that T.H. Bell was tolling for the conservative nucleus that President Reagan sought to implant in the Carter-built ED.

Uzzell expands on one of the themes played by Reagan, who ignites the book with an Overview of Education Reform Issues. The president's light shines on tuition tax credits, vouchers, prayer in schools, merit pay and business-school partnerships.

Uzzell heads a new foundation that has put a number of stimulating reform proposals into the school hopper. In this essay, he sells tuition tax credits short as too little to rescue low-income nontax payers, especially blacks and Hispanics, who must put up with inferior public schooling.

The genius of the voucher plan Uzzell espouses is that no new money need be drawn from the ravished federal till. He would use the $3 billion now set aside for the disadvantaged in Chapter 1 funds. He does not satisfy me that the rush of millions of voucher holders on school with the best reputations—public and private—would induce anything but chaos.

In a calmer mood, Uzzell indicates a willingness to consider small-scale experiments. He correctly notes that powerhouses like the National Education Association are opposed to vouchers—no matter how small.

The NEA, a union of 1.7 million teachers, is headed by left-wingers who thrust into classrooms their literature on nuclear freeze, gun control, ERA, affirmative action and other anti-administration positions. The NEA is deftly knocked on the head by Marcella Hadeed, a graduate law student, in The Politicization of the Classroom.

William Ball, renowned constitutional lawyer, reviews Parental Rights in Schooling. He is a staunch defender of private schools who offers a word of caution to those who see money as the answer to private-parochial school prayers. "Funding," he advises, "may indeed weaken such schools not only because of the inevitable bureaucratic controls which it will impose, but because of what it may do to initiative, the spirit of sacrifice, and the dedication of religious adherents."

A law school professor, Stephen Arons, echoes Ball's plea for private schools, without the Ball reservation. "Although the importance of freedom of choice has been trumpeted, the reality is that it does not exist," Arons declares. "Since 1925, economics has made the right of school choice the property of the rich . . ." For the moment, he overlooks some 5 million not-so-rich who sacrifice to pay the relatively slight parochial school tuition costs.

Arons spins off from the Oregon Parochial School Case (1925), in which the Supreme Court guaranteed the right of parents to select a school other than a public school for their children. Both Arons and Ball cite major school cases on prayer in schools, discipline, parental rights of choice and a range of decisions that have been handed down by federal courts, especially since the 1962 ban on prayer.

Discipline in the Classroom occupied yet another lawyer-contributor, Roger Clegg. He serves the usual indigestible diet of school crime as evidence of a concern that remains No. 1 on the public's list of school problems. He is right in noting that minority children, especially, suffer from violence in schools.

Strong principals are hailed in the anthology for turning schools around. Thomas Ascik, employed by ED as a researcher, dips into his archives for studies identifying as the key to effective schools a strong principal, agreement on a common goal, belief in importance of academics and a family-like school atmosphere. What else is new? If there is one sure sewer into which federal bucks are shoveled to a point of no return, it is educational research—the art of documenting the obvious, or reaching predetermined conclusions.

A more practical pitch for educational reform is made by James LoGerfo, a history teacher, in The Training of Teachers: A Dubious Record. He explores his home state, New Jersey, now seeking a way out of the maze of education-course requirements that have insulted the intelligence of teachers for too many decades. LoGerfo is for on-the-job training of college graduates honed in subject matter.

Linda Chavez, staff director of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, makes a strange but inspirational appearance in this collection. In Citizenship Education: Recovering a Lost Dimension, she cries out for schools that teach loyalty. Rallied to her side are biblical Ruth, Socrates and Penelope's fidelity to Odysseus during his 20 years away from home.

Chavez quotes Rabbi Hillel: "If I am not for myself who is for me? But if I am only for myself, what am I?" Good question for draft dodgers and some teachers who demean their country while supporting a left-leaning axis.

Pitching from a different mound than the hard-throwing conservatives in these pages are two educators, Benjamin Alexander and Preston Royster, who identify themselves as blacks. In Issues in the Educational Progress of Black People, they adhere to affirmative action as a necessary corrective for past discrimination. They put down black English, but use this as an entree for a defense of bilingual education in which foreign-speaking children are immersed in their native language so they should not fall behind in school subjects. What rot! They are oblivious to the political ripoff by the Hispanic congressional caucus determined to assure themselves of Spanish-speaking constituencies.

Also contained in this cornucopia of conservative ideas on schooling is an essay by Raymond Moore, The Cradle and the Gap. Moore is a great believer in home schooling, at least until the age of 8–10. He consigns nursery schools to perdition and sagely predicts: ". . . the earlier you institutionalize your children, the earlier they will institutionalize you."

A parent activist in Arizona, Marcia Sielaff, inveighs against moral values imposed on children by the education establishment. She flays the professionals for "intransigence," and envisages formation of "a volunteer army" of parents who will reclaim traditional values for the public schools.

Finally, One Teacher's Opinion, by Thomas J. Donovan, is the cream on a sweet reform cake. Donovan looks back on a half-century in front of and behind the teacher's desk. Today's semiliterate new teachers might well cringe if they were to read Donovan's modest account of his education in a Washington state Catholic school. Donovan went on to survive the hail of "New Math," "New Social Studies" and hardware following Sputnik; the wave of Mickey Mouse and mini-courses imposed by the students' rights movement in the Vietnam War years. He recapitulates with charm and verve the experiences of thousands of teachers who have departed the schools.

Each essay is documented with footnotes at the end. There is even a bibliography at the end of Arons' contribution, and capsule bios of the writers.

And now for the fly in an otherwise tasty soup. I had hoped to use the book as a reference work for picking up fugitive facts and current conservative positions. That possibility is largely lost. The book has no index. How could you, Mrs. Marshner?●

EMERGENCY ACTION FOR SOVIET JEWS

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, today the National Conference on Soviet Jewry is sponsoring the Emergency Action for Soviet Jewry in order to call congressional and national attention to the alarming resistance faced by Jews in the Soviet Union seeking to repatriate to Israel and to freely practice their religion. Members of the national conference are on the Hill today to participate in the symbolic "Prisoner Lunch" sponsored jointly by the Congressional Coalition for Soviet Jews and the Congressional Wives for Soviet Jews. Special action teams will also visit the offices of individual Members and Senators throughout the afternoon.

But today I would also like to call special attention to the current plight of Yakov Mesh, a refusenik who I have worked on behalf for the past year. During his recent arrest, Yakov was brutally beaten, including blows to the head. Two weeks later he became very ill with an infection and high grade fever. While in prison, he reportedly went for another 2 weeks without medical treatment. Presently, he has been released pending trial, but he is weak and listless, having lost over 30 pounds from his illness.

In letters that I am sending today, and here on the House floor, I strongly urge Soviet authorities, especially given the severity of his condition, to drop the charges against Yakov Mesh and allow him and his family to emigrate to Israel as they were given permission to do back in 1978.●

PUBLIC HOUSING RENTAL STABILIZATION ACT

HON. GUY V. MOLINARI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, 1985, I reintroduced the Public Housing Rental Stabilization Act, legislation which would allow housing authorities to reestablish a rent cap for their public housing. This is of great importance for the preservation and enhancement of this country's public housing stock. H.R. 153 was introduced with 16 cosponsors and has been endorsed by the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment officials, the Council of Large Public Housing Authorities, the New York City Housing Authority, and other housing organizations.

H.R. 153, the Public Housing Rental Stabilization Act, would have the effect of alleviating the severe economic impact upon lower income and working poor tenants brought about by the open-ended, rent-to-income policy established by the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981. Without a limitation on this open-ended rent structure, many existing stable and working class tenants will be forced to move out, thereby undermining the viability of many projects and surrounding neighborhoods, as well as substantially increasing the public housing operating subsidy requirements. The bill would accomplish this goal by allowing public housing authorities to establish a maximum rent for apartments based on the economic rent of the unit; that is, the total of debt service and operating expenses, or comparable market rents.

The need for the remedial legislation which I am proposing is not only supported by the evidence, but has also been confirmed time and time again by the Congress. It was the 1974 Housing and Community Development Act that heralded the importance of economic mixing of tenants in developments and neighborhoods in which public housing is situated. The economic mix concept basically consisted of working families of low and moderate income, as well as the very poor and elderly. The mandate was that housing authorities attain tenant bodies composed of families with a broad range of income and rent paying ability to avoid dense concentrations of only the very lowest income families. A blending of these very low income tenants with working class and even middle class residents of the surrounding neighborhoods was correctly believed in Washington to be a much more appropriate prescription for success in our Nation's public housing.

The positive and successfully implemented intentions of the 1974 act, in promoting a broad economic mix of tenants, were significantly moderated by the Omnibus Budget and Reconciliation Act of 1981. This act overrode all prior public housing rent schedules by requiring that all tenants pay 30 percent of their income for rent regardless of size, location, or actual cost or age of rental units. HUD-approved rent caps, and other local control in the determination of rents, were casualties of this act. The result, of course, is that the more stable working families of incomes between 50 and 80 percent of median income who are eligible to live in public housing are being forced to move out by higher rents, often into inadequate housing.

The 1981 act made the assumption that the current economic mix policy had the ill effect of giving moderate income families priority for housing subsidies while truly poor families remained on waiting lists. No one can argue with the notion of underscoring the importance of assisting the neediest of our society. But how can we best serve the interests of this group? I do not believe that we accomplish this by facilitating the decline of the very public housing stock upon which the needy depend. We certainly have enough experience in this area to produce evidence that illustrates social change and economic mobility are enhanced by encouraging housing in which families of different incomes and in different age groups can live together. We also have the experience with public housing that contains only the very poorest of our society.

No one is talking about providing housing subsidies to families that are middle income or free to find adequate housing in the private sector. A broad income mix means a cross section of lower, low, and lowest income families that also includes people who are largely self-supporting but need some help in obtaining decent housing. This group will include people with upward mobility who will provide leadership in developing good and stable communities.

Evidence in New York City public housing points to the fact that new tenants who are required to pay immediately 30 percent of their income for rent are experiencing a decline, for the first time, in their average gross income. Statistics are also showing a 20-percent refusal rate for working family applicants, who maintain that the rents are too high. Lower income working families, in an environment with a 30-percent rent-to-income ratio, are required to pay as much as $500 per month in some cases. This is clearly a burdensome situation for those trying to meet their basic needs. A rent of $500 per month in a case such as this is over and above the economic rent necessary to operate the particular unit. In New York City, for example, the economic rent, or the sum of operating costs and debt service, would be $395 per month for a four-room apartment and $435 for a five-room unit. The most glaring evidence has come from areas where comparably priced housing has been available in the private sector. In these areas the higher turnover seems to be closely correlated with the pressure of rising rents. The vast majority of the moveouts have been the working poor. Some projects in New York City have experienced turnover rates double those of the city housing authority's average.

What are some of the other consequences of the absence of a rent cap? One of the arguments we often hear in opposition to a rent cap is heard in the context of cost consciousness. The criticism is that in times of austerity the Federal Government should not be in the business of channeling scarce resources to those who do not really need the help. If part of the concern is indeed budget constraints, a rent cap will in fact help avert additional subsidy, not contribute to it. In New York City, for example, 15 percent of the tenants in the housing authority's federally aided Public Housing Program have annual gross incomes of $16,000 or more. These lower income working families pay about $80 million a year in rent, which is approximately 29 percent of the total rental income of the authority. If the lower income working tenants are driven out of public housing due to the inability to pay the 30-percent rent-to-income ratio, there will be a drastic loss in rental income to the authority because the incoming tenants will have significantly reduced incomes and rent levels. As an example, if rent were capped at an average of $400 per month, the 22,500 lower income tenants in New York City would provide the authority with rental income of $108 million per year. If those tenants found this rent prohibitive and moved out, the incoming tenants—with average incomes of $9,000 per year—would be paying an average rent of $225 per month. Their aggregate rental income would amount to $61 million per year. This would reflect a loss to the authority of $47 million in rental income. Under the performance funding system [PFS] for allocating operating subsidy, this loss of income would have to be picked up, dollar for dollar, through operating subsidy at the expense of the Federal Government and the taxpayers. This scenario seems to run in direct contradiction to the assertion that the need to control Federal outlays means the economic mixing must be deemphasized.

We have the opportunity, with the introduction of this bill, to show the kind of foresight that is so essential to the success of public housing in our Nation's cities. We have the experience of the implementation of the 1974 act to illustrate the merits of bringing together a broad economic mix of tenants in projects that hitherto had only the experience of dense concentrations of the very poorest tenants. The move outs are already occurring in projects around the country, but if Congress acts now and shows an understanding that public housing and its tenants are best served by a policy that brings together tenants of many different incomes, I believe we can cut short an exodus that can only end in unstable projects and isolated communities.●

WEATHER VANE CAPITAL WHITEHALL AND MONTAGUE, MI

HON. GUY VANDER JAGT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. VANDER JAGT. Mr. Speaker, western Michigan, and particularly our Ninth Congressional District of Michigan, is extremely proud of its twin cities of Whitehall and Montague. These fine communities are rightfully staking claim to being the weather vane center of the world. They have what they are certain is the largest weather vane ever built.

On September 15, 1984, the 48-foot-tall 3,500 pound vane was dedicated as the trademark of the company that created it, Whitehall Metal Studios Inc. The vane was erected August 24 at the edge of White Lake, which is almost directly between the neighboring cities. The new vane is topped with a model resembling a schooner that once traversed the Great Lakes with Michigan lumber. The 26-foot directional arrow is a replica of the Ella Ellenwood, which was owned and operated by Capt. Thomas Flagstad of Montague.

Richard Read, vice-president and general manager of Whitehall Metal Studios, said the firm produces about 60,000 vanes annually. President Ronald Reagan is among its satisfied customers.

The company was founded in 1938 by Thomas M. Pletcher, the grandfather of the present owner, Thomas S. Pletcher. The company was first opened in Chicago, but later moved to Whitehall. Neighboring Montague is now the home of the firm which employs about 32 people year round.

Richard Read said that nearly 200 different weather vanes are sold by the company. He stated that there is not a mass market for any one design, but there is a good market for all of them together.

Mr. Speaker, I salute the people of the neighboring cities of Whitehall and Montague and Whitehall Metal Studios for their accomplishment of being a weather vane capital.

In conclusion, I insert at this time a very fine feature story on Montague and Whitehall which appeared in the Detroit News last September.

The story follows:

VILLAGES MAKE A POINT

(By Ron Koehler)

MONTAGUE.—Western Michigan's twin villages of Whitehall and Montague rapidly are staking claim to being the weather vane center of the world.

After all, they have what they think is the largest weather vane ever built anywhere—and who is to dispute them?

The 48-foot-tall, 3,500-pound vane is to be dedicated Saturday as the trademark of the company that created it, Whitehall Metal Studios Inc. Whitehall Metal is a small company that calls itself the world's largest manufacturer of weather vanes.

The new vane is topped with a model resembling the schooners that once traversed the Great Lakes with Michigan lumber.

Officials hope it will draw a number of visitors to the area, located just north of Muskegon. The vane was erected Aug. 24 at the edge of White Lake, almost directly between the neighboring villages, which have a combined population of about 6,000.

At least 16 local individuals and companies contributed materials and services for the vane.

There aren't many companies willing to dispute Whitehall Metal's claims about its vanes. Richard Read, vice-president and general manager, says the firm produces about 60,000 vanes annually. It lists President Reagan among its satisfied customers.

The president has a Standard 500 model adorned with a stallion that boasts a 23-karat gold-leaf coating. That vane, which proudly stands atop the gazebo at the Reagan ranch in the mountains outside Santa Barbara, Calif., sells for about $280.

The president's gazebo also displays another production from Whitehall Metal Studios, an aluminum cast sign that says, "The Reagans, 1600 Penna. Ave."

That sign, also adorned with a golden horse, was given to Mr. Reagan by one of the company's distributors in Washington, D.C., shortly after he was elected president, Read says.

The company is not so sure about the background, but, as the story goes, Mr. Reagan saw the piece in a Santa Barbara hardware store and bought it because he thought "it was one of the best-looking horse figures he had ever seen."

As for Whitehall's new vane, the schooner resting atop the 26-foot directional arrow is a replica of the Ella Ellenwood, which was owned and operated by Capt. Thomas Flagstad of Montague.

The 157-ton Ella Ellenwood ferried lumber across the Great Lakes from 1869 until 1901, when she ran aground eight miles north of the Milwaukee Harbor on Fox Point.

As legend has it, waves and strong northerly winds crushed the schooner while it was helplessly moored aground.

A portion of the cargo was saved, but the rest of the ship was lost to its home port of Whitehall until the next spring, when a piece of its nameplate emblazoned "Ellenwood" was found in White Lake Channel.

It seems a bit incredible to believe the nameplate floated around Lake Michigan and miraculously returned to its home, but that's the story.

The history of Whitehall Metal Studios is more believable. The company was founded in 1938 by Thomas M. Pletcher, the grandfather of present owner Thomas S. Pletcher. The company first opened in Chicago and later moved to Whitehall, which in the early 1900s was a popular resort area frequented by Chicagoans.

Whitehall Metal Studios now is located in neighboring Montague in a large building that houses its factory, offices and a showroom-retail shop. The firm employs about 32 people year round.

Read says the company owes its success to the wide array of weather vanes it sells.

"We sell nearly 200 different individual types of weather vanes," he says. "That's one of the reasons we're still in business. We sell so many items, a few of each, that they can't be cheaply made by others.

"There's not a mass market for any one design but there's a good market for all of them together."●

MAHARISHI VEDIC UNIVERSITY

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to inform my colleagues of the founding of the Maharishi Vedic University here in the District of Columbia.

On January 12, 1985, Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, founder of Maharishi International University in Fairfield, IA, and Maharishi International University College of Natural Law in Washington, DC, opened Maharishi Vedic University establishing it as a center to conduct scholarly research in Vedic literature, and to bring together the foremost Vedic scholars of India and leading scientists of the world.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the citizens of the District of Columbia, I extend a warm welcome to the officers, instructors, staff, and students of Maharishi Vedic University and encourage them in their pursuit of learning through unified field based education. I think we can expect the establishment of Maharishi Vedic University to strengthen the relationship between India and the United States, and between leading exponents of the ancient Vedic tradition of the East and the modern scientific tradition of the West.●

LAKE HOUSTON WATER QUALITY IMPROVEMENT ACT

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, as someone who strongly supports a clean and safe environment, I am pleased to introduce legislation today to improve water quality in the Lake Houston watershed.

Lake Houston is a 12,000-acre manmade lake located northeast of the city of Houston within Harris County, TX. Owned by the city, Lake Houston was created in 1954 by damming the San Jacinto River to provide city residents with an alternative source of drinking water to offset the area's rapidly depleting groundwater supply.

Based on current estimates, it is expected that the lake will continue to provide drinking water to some 40 to 50 percent of the city's population.

As the Member of Congress who proudly represents the Lake Houston area, I have long recognized the importance of this vital watershed in providing both safe drinking water to the city and recreational opportunities for thousands of my constituents in the Eighth Congressional District.

At the same time, I have viewed with alarm the recent increases in the level of fecal coliform bacteria in the lake. In fact, during a period last year, the Houston Water Department found that 12 out of its 14 sampling locations around the lake exceeded the pollution standards for water used for contact recreation.

While the water quality in the lake has fluctuated in recent months, the problem of fecal coliform bacteria remains a serious and unresolved matter.

In response to this problem, a number of my constituents asked me to become personally involved in an effort to clean up Lake Houston.

Although there has been a great deal of discussion, unfortunately, both the city and the State have been unable, because of a lack of resources, to effectively deal with the pollution problem that exists.

Despite the fact that Lake Houston is owned by the city, the U.S. Congress has a responsibility and jurisdiction, under the Federal Water Pollution Control Act and the Clean Water Act, to protect our Nation's water quality.

We must ensure that in the years ahead our rivers, lakes, and streams are safe and pure for all Americans.

With that goal clearly in mind, I approached our colleagues on the Public Works and Transportation Committee and acquainted them with the problems facing Lake Houston. As a result of my discussions, language was drafted and a Lake Houston amendment was incorporated within H.R. 3282, the Water Quality Renewal Act of 1984.

While this important legislation was overwhelmingly approved by the House of Representatives on June 26, 1984, the other body regrettably failed to consider this proposal.

The legislation I am introducing today is identical to the language contained within H.R. 3282. The purpose of my legislation is to amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act. It is designed to accomplish three objectives.

First, it authorizes the Federal Environmental Protection Agency, in cooperation with the State of Texas, to study the water quality problems in the lake and to report their findings to the Congress within 1 year.

Second, it directs EPA to set up a comprehensive monitoring system of the more than 200 waste water treatment plants that are located in and around Lake Houston. With the tremendous population growth in this area, the number of waste water treatment plants has increased dramatically. It is these plants, or at least some of them, which have been identified as the source of the pollution problem.

Instead of simply gathering water samples from a few locations, my amendment would allow EPA to comprehensively monitor the discharges of most, if not all, of the waste water treatment plants.

Finally, the amendment provides EPA with the authority to undertake any interim or emergency cleanup measures that may become necessary. In this way, we can ensure that EPA has the flexibility to respond to any emergency in a timely and expeditious manner.

In order to carry out these functions, my bill authorizes $10 million for the EPA to both study and resolve this very serious problem.

In so doing, I anticipate that the majority of the funds will be used by EPA to monitor the various treatment plants. In addition, this money will be available for those cleanup efforts necessary to ensure that Lake Houston remains a source of clean drinking water and safe recreational opportunities in the years ahead.

My ultimate goals are to guarantee the water quality of Lake Houston, to prevent a hysteria from developing that Lake Houston is a dirty, polluted lake, and to determine the best way for us to keep the lake clean in the future. The EPA's study will accomplish those objectives. In addition, it will likely determine whether or not construction of a large regional waste water treatment plant, for instance, could improve water quality in the lake.

Mr. Speaker, Congress made a commitment to the American people, through the passage of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act and the Clean Water Act, that the Federal Government would improve and then maintain the highest quality and cleanliness of our precious water resources.

I believe passage of the Lake Houston Water Quality Improvement Act will continue that vital commitment to both our Nation and to the people of the Eighth Congressional District. I urge its expeditious enactment by my colleagues in the House of Representatives.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

IT'S A MESSAGE WE DARE NOT IGNORE

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, today the National Conference on Soviet Jewry is sponsoring an emergency action for Soviet Jews. The emergency action is designed to highlight the plight of the thousands of Soviet Jews who have been refused the right to emigrate—fewer than 1,000 were allowed to emigrate in 1984—and are harassed while they remain in the Soviet Union. I would like to take this opportunity to call my colleagues' attention to the moving words of those Jews who still remain in the Soviet Union and still suffer.

IT'S A MESSAGE WE DARE NOT IGNORE

We appeal to you in this extremely difficult hour. Many of our friends have been arrested lately and we do not know who the next victim is going to be.

Today we call on you: Do not remain indifferent to our fate! After all, the fate of many of you could have been the same as ours if your grandmothers and grandfathers had not left Russia several decades ago.

Yes, these decades of living in different conditions have left an imprint both on us and on you. And today, we differ from each other, but does this have to divide us? Can several decades cross out the experience of two thousand years and overshadow that which is most important—our common, tragic and glorious past and our historic responsibility for our common future?

Remember! We have a common future!

When you send your children off to a Jewish school, remember that we do not have Jewish schools. When you pick up a Jewish book, remember that we do not have Jewish books. When you lovingly touch a mezuzah, remember that here mezuzot are being torn off during the searches. When you study our beautiful ancient and modern language, remember that here Hebrew teachers are being sent to prison on the basis of trumped-up charges of hooliganism and possession of arms or drugs.

Jewish mothers, remember! Dora Zunshain, the mother of the Prisoner of Conscience, Zakhar Zunshain, could not bear the hardship of seeing her son arrested, convicted and sent to prison. She died suddenly after hearing about his suffering and the terrible details of his prison conditions.

Remember! Anatoly Scharansky, Iosif Begun, Yuli Tarnopolsky, and Moshe Abramov might be starting this day in an isolation cell or a punishment ward. Your fate could have been similar to theirs if you were a Soviet Jew wishing to repatriate to Israel.

Remember! A day might come when you might sorely miss the hundreds of thousands of us who are doomed to extinction.

Remember! Once, forty years ago you kept silent. Now, speak out about us and speak out for us. Speak out in spite of the gags they put in our mouths and shout about the danger we are in. Remember—we are deprived even of this opportunity.—Signed by 66 Soviet Jews from Moscow, Leningrad, Odessa, Riga and Tbilisi.●

LIBERTY'S TORCH ON TOUR

HON. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report to my colleagues in the House of Representatives on a unique and historic tour of a venerated national icon and to acknowledge and give credit to those persons and organizations which were instrumental in bringing to fruition this extraordinary event.

I am referring to the western tour of the torch of the Statue of Liberty, from New York to California, from Ellis Island to Pasadena. As many of you no doubt recall, the torch was the centerpiece of the first float in the 1985 Tournament of Roses Parade. The theme of the parade, which has become a national New Year's Day tradition, was "The Spirit of America." What could be a more fitting symbol of "The Spirit of America" than the torch of the Statue of Liberty. And who could be a more fitting grand marshal of the floral extravaganza than Lee A. Iacocca, chairman of the effort to renew and restore Ellis Island and the Statue of Liberty, one of our country's most beloved memorials.

The principal benefactor of the torch's tour was Barron Hilton, chairman and president of Hilton Hotels Corp. He said the company was "honored to display the torch from our Nation's most cherished symbol of freedom and liberty." He said the company was privileged to build a float for the torch and to lead the parade with so unique an object.

The presence of Liberty's lamp in southern California generated great excitement. It began with the torch's arrival at Los Angeles International Airport. Under the care of Flying Tiger and Allied Van Lines, the torch did a great deal to increase awareness of the restoration project. Thousands of persons visited the torch during the preparade decorating period and more than 125 million watched the parade on television. More than a million spectators lined the streets of Pasadena on New Year's Day to see the torch lead the pageant and upwards to a million more persons visited the post-parade viewing area.

Perhaps the most moving feature of the torch's presence in the 22d Congressional District occurred on December 28 when a naturalization ceremony was held at Fiesta Floats in Temple City. Forty-three persons were sworn in as new American citizens beside the torch, illuminated from within just as it has been atop Miss Liberty's arm in New York Harbor.

The idea for the swearing-in ceremony came from Timothy Connaghan, a Jaycee from Sierra Madre, CA, who with the support of the California Jaycees coordinated the planning and organization of the event.

Speaking on behalf of the 750,000 members of the United States Jaycees, national president Tommy Todd illuminated with the drama of the occasion when he spoke of the opportunities which exist in America. "Only in America would a young man such as myself be afforded an opportunity in a 9-year span to move from pumping gas in Byron, GA, to be able to take part in an event such as this representing a major national organization like the Jaycees." He challenged the new citizens "to meet the responsibilities with as much fervor as they do in accepting the opportunities."

Greg Stavish, president of the California Jaycees, summed up the Jaycees' interest and pride in sponsoring the ceremony. Many of the native born Americans attending the ceremony applauded when he commented,

How lucky I am, being born in America. I have never heard the oath of citizenship. I felt the words were so strong and so meaningful to me, that after being a citizen for 33 years in the United States of America I have been reborn as a citizen of this great country.

Among the speakers at the ceremony was James R. Galbraith, the senior vice president of Hilton who conceived the idea for the torch's involvement in the Tournament of Roses Parade and who joined with Mr. Hilton over several months in working out the arrangements with the appropriate private and government entities. In welcoming the new citizens, Mr. Galbraith asked them to join other Americans "in stoking the fire of patriotism which is ablaze across the country and in celebration of the belief that the endearing quality of Miss Liberty is her enduring quality of liberty and justice for all."

The closing of the naturalization ceremony featured the reading of a special telegram sent by President Reagan, in which he stated,

In choosing America as your new home, you are now a part of what many believe to be the greatest country in the world * * *. So I ask you to give America your heart and all your energy. Together, in common purpose and faith, we shall keep America as the last, great hope on God's Earth.

I have attended many naturalization events but none had the power and the glory of this marvelous outdoor ceremony.

Throughout the torch's stay in southern California it was protected by National Park Service rangers. The rangers not only provided security but performed a fine public relations service as hundreds of thousands of people who have never been to New York City were given an opportunity to see first-hand the actual torch of the Statue of Liberty. In helping to make all of this possible, I note the cooperation of William P. Clark, Secretary of the Department of the Interior, Assistant Secretary G. Ray Arnett, and National Park Service Director Russell E. Dickenson. A special thanks is given to Mr. Arnett, who early on had the vision to see the far-reaching implications of this project. By coincidence, all three men are retiring from their positions and we wish them well. They—along with executives at Hilton Hotels Corp., the Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island Foundation, the Jaycees and the Tournament of Roses Association—made all of this possible.

Mr. Speaker, I am firmly convinced that a wave of patriotism is sweeping our country, fueled by the Olympic torch run last summer and now by the torch of the Statue of Liberty. I encourage all Americans to nurture these patriotic stirrings and to join together in making certain the flames of hope and liberty burn brightly for countless years to come.●

ABDUCTION OF WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, international terrorism is one of the cruelest and most dangerous scourages afflicting the modern world.

Among the most disturbing trends of our times is the increase in terrorism directed against diplomats—those whose business is peace and reconciliation. Diplomats are tempting targets for those whose personal or political temperaments run higher than their personal courage. By the nature of their job, diplomats are visible and vulnerable representatives of their nation. They do not carry arms. They do not seclude themselves in safe locations—they go about openly in the nations to which they are assigned, and deal with the public there. The vital business of diplomacy, which makes envoys from the United States and other nations targets of violence, also makes this sort of violence particularly pernicious and damaging, by making more difficult the practice of foreign relations which can lead to the peaceful settlement of international grievances.

Mr. Speaker, William F. Buckley, a distinguished American envoy and a native of Stoneham, MA, was kidnaped around March 16, 1984, in Beirut, Lebanon. All who know of Mr. Buckley's situation pray and wait anxiously for his safe release, and the release of the other Americans who have apparently been abducted in Lebanon.

The Town of Stoneham has passed a resolution on behalf of Mr. Buckley. I would like to request that this resolution be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

RESOLUTION

Whereas: William F. Buckley, Jr. is a native of the Town of Stoneham, Massachusetts, and a 1947 graduate of Stoneham High School, and

Whereas: said William F. Buckley, Jr. is a highly respected and outstanding citizen of our community, and

Whereas: evidence has been received of the abduction of U.S. Envoy William F. Buckley, Jr. on or about March 16, 1984 in Beirut, Lebanon, and

Whereas: the deep concern of all the townspeople of Stoneham as to the welfare of William F. Buckley, Jr. is quite evident, and that prayers for his well being are said daily now, therefore, it is

Resolved, that the Board of Selectmen of the Town of Stoneham, Masssachusetts, at their meeting on January 8, 1985, officially recognized the concerted efforts of the United States and Lebanese Governments in striving to effect the release of said William F. Buckley, Jr. and hereby offer our fullest cooperation in any way which might accomplish his safe return to the United States.

THE CONRAIL PRIVATIZATION ACT OF 1985

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to return the federally owned Consolidated Rail Corporation [Conrail] to the private sector. This bill is the culmination of an effort I and 17 of my colleagues in the House undertook last summer to spur public debate on the future of the railroad.

Conrail is a vital part of the regional economy of the Northeast and Midwest. In my own State of Pennsylvania, Conrail purchased $133 million of goods and services in 1983, and the State received $2.6 million from real estate and corporate taxes. Conrail employs over 15,000 Pennsylvanians, including 6,400 in the Philadelphia area, 3,000 in Pittsburgh, and 3,000 in its Harrisburg region. The railroad provides support to the industry of Pennsylvania and the rest of the region.

My bill, the Conrail Privatization Act of 1985, provides for a public offering of the Government's common stock interest in the railroad. While this is in contrast to Transportation Secretary Dole's announced plan to sell Conrail to one of three private bidders, I believe that a public offering is in the best interests of Pennsylvania, the Northeast-Midwest region which Conrail serves, and the Nation as a whole. Let me explain why.

The regional economy of the 15 States currently served by Conrail's 14,200 track-miles is vitally dependent on adequate rail transportation service. Many parts of the Northeast and Midwest have not yet recovered from the levels of unemployment brought about by two back-to-back recessions in the early part of the decade. Yet a change of Conrail ownership, which, under the Secretary of Transportation's plan, would provide for the sale of the railroad to one bidder, could require major economic adjustments and risk serious curtailment of rail service in the region.

Selling all Government-owned Conrail stock to one bidder increases the likelihood that the railroad will cut service and reduce its commitment to the region. It has become abundantly clear that no matter how many covenants the Government enters into with one bidder as a precondition for sale, no real assurances can be given concerning the fate of service contracts in force today on Conrail lines, rate increases, service patterns, protection of trackage rights of other carriers, and the enhancement of rail competition in the area. Current Conrail management has done a remarkable job in turning the railroad around and making it profitable. Along with Conrail labor, they have earned the trust of the region. A public offering would retain this team and avert an unnecessary economic jolt to Pennsylvania and the rest of the Northeast and Midwest.

Furthermore, with almost 1,300 miles of main line in Pennsylvania, and thousands of additional miles in other States, Conrail is part of a larger infrastructure supporting the Northeast-Midwest region; the railroad has a responsibility to help maintain that important structural web. No private bidder can guarantee the fate of so-called orphan bridges and other deferred and neglected infrastructure maintenance along the Conrail system, yet in recent years Conrail has been reinvesting profits in similar rebuilding projects. I believe that we need to maintain and continue the massive Federal infrastructure investment in this area—and a public offering is the best way to achieve such a result. We cannot take the risk that track, right of way, bridges, and rail yards will be neglected as they have been by previous owners of the railroads serving the area.

A public offering, with provision for an expansion of shares in the employee stock ownership plan [ESOP], will also assure continued participation by Conrail's employees in guiding the railroad in the future. These employees made significant concessions along the path to Conrail profitability; they deserve to be accommodated not only on wage but also equity issues.

Finally, a public offering may very likely have a more favorable impact overall on future Government tax revenues. By privatizing Conrail in the way I have proposed, the railroad's future tax benefits could not be used to shelter non-Conrail income. In contrast, a private bidder may be able to shelter a portion of its non-Conrail income. Another consideration is that the taxpayers have sunk over $7 billion into the railroad. Thus, the broadest group of taxpayers should be given the opportunity to participate in the future of the company they rescued. A public offering provides the chance both now and in the future for broad public participation in Conrail rather than selling it to a special few.

The legislation I am introducing today has several major provisions. Broadly, Conrail will issue 25 million shares of common stock, raising net proceeds of $500 million and reserving approximately $4.4 million for the ESOP. A sale of preferred stock will raise $600 million; adding $300 million from Conrail's cash on hand will make a total package of $1.4 billion, $200 million more than the approximate level of the private bids. A hostile takeover would be thwarted by a provision limiting any one holder or its affiliates to 10 percent of voting securities. In order to insure continuity and a smooth transition, the bill also includes a clause requiring Conrail to keep its headquarters in Philadelphia.

In addition, the bill provides for the Federal Government to retain a golden share—a special clause that would be tantamount to giving the Government veto power over certain future transactions inimical to the railroad or the region. The taxpayers have paid the price; they have earned the right to retain that share. While our government has never before used this specific mechanism, there is ample precedent for the Government's involvement in certain similarly-structured transactions. For example, the Communications Satellite Act of 1962, which created the Communications Satellite Corporation, imposed prohibitions on ownership of shares. Also, the privatization experience in Great Britain over the past several years may be enlightening here. The Conrail situation is a special one which calls for special safeguards—the golden share is one way to protect the public interest.

In summary, the key issue is whether the public interest and public investment in preserving rail service and economic progress in the Northeast-Midwest region will be enhanced or negated by the sale of Conrail to one private bidder. We must determine whether future economic progress in the region is the goal of the sale or merely subordinate to the amount of money being offered for the railroad or some other consideration. A public offering returns a greater part of the taxpayer investment in Conrail while keeping the railroad accountable to the public which rescued it, It both allows the Government to get out of the business of running a railroad and gives us an opportunity to protect the public interest. Mr. Speaker. I urge my colleagues to support the Conrail Privatization Act of 1985.●

TAKE CARE IN CUTTING DEFENSE

HON. THOMAS F. HARTNETT

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, the upcoming budget debate promises to be a difficult one. Obviously, we must look at all Federal spending if we are to get the deficit under control. I would ask my colleagues to be particularly cautious, however, with respect to our defense dollars. For your consideration in this matter, I am entering into the RECORD the following editorial from the December 5, 1984, Charleston News and Courier which I feel to be instructive.

TAKE CARE IN CUTTING DEFENSE

As the 1986 budget takes shape within the Reagan administration, more and more attention is being focused on cutting defense spending as one means of curbing the soaring national deficit. Still, the president, while agreeing to an overall freeze on government spending, would allow Social Security and defense to grow while other budget areas would be trimmed back or scrapped altogether. Those who would cut defense for 1986 should first evaluate what Reagan defense budgets have accomplished over the past four years.

Four years ago, the U.S. ability to defend itself was marginal and slipping rapidly. Since World War II, presidents have had to choose between modernizing and enlarging the armed forces or building up stockpiles of ammunition, spare parts and fuel for weapons already in the inventory. There was never enough money to do both. The Johnson and Nixon administrations deferred modernization to fight the Vietnam war. President Carter did next to nothing for defense while he was in office.

By 1981, military morale and preparedness were in a deep slough. Grave doubts existed about the efficacy of the all-volunteer military, re-enlistment percentages were down and by every measurable statistic, the Soviet Union was gaining the military superiority necessary to dictate conditions to the Free World. There was no need for the Soviet leaders to continue the farce of negotiating arms limitations or reductions because it was no longer in their national best interest to do so.

President Reagan moved forcibly to address what was, in fact, a quality gap. (There is no way we could compete with the Russians in the quantity of military hardware.) His first priorities were a return to a strengthened, 600-ship Navy, production of the M-1 tank and, in the strategic arena, the MX missile and the B-1 bomber. Today, American forces are substantially more ready and sustainable, retention rates and recruit quality are at all-time highs and morale is soaring.

And now, not coincidentally, the Russians are saying they want to resume talks about arms limitations and force reductions. Why the about face? Only the very naive would attribute it to some Soviet hope for world harmony. No, the old men in the Kremlin realize their quest for military superiority is failing and negotiating is now in their national interest.

At the same time, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger is over in Brussels criticizing our NATO partners for not carrying their fair share of the defense load. Again, because of increases in U.S. defense spending, our allies are expected to commit more of their resources to defense—an idea that was scoffed at during the Carter years.

There is no denying the need to reduce the national deficit. Also there should be no sacred cows when it comes to cutting budgets. But when it comes to defense, the choice is not just between guns and butter. It also affects our ability to get the Soviets to agree to arms reductions and limitation treaties and to lead our own allies into sharing the costs of defending the Free World. We are where we're at because we were willing to spend the money to strengthen our military posture. Let's not lose that through some spate of random budget cutting with a meat cleaver.●

SELF HELP FOUNDATION: A WORLD SERVICE

HON. BERKLEY BEDELL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, a number of Rotary Clubs and churches across America, including several in my district in northern and northwestern Iowa, are actively involved in supporting the Self Help Foundation as it strives to fight hunger in the developing portions of our world.

The new Governor of Rotary District 597, Michael V. Karnis from my hometown of Spirit Lake, IA, recently provided me with information about the extremely worthwhile goals of this foundation.

The story of the Self-Help Foundation and what it is accomplishing is rewarding and encouraging, and I commend Mr. Karnis' description of its work to the attention of my colleagues:

The best way to serve people in the hungry nations is to help those people help themselves. To give them things does not truly serve them; it makes them dependent. To truly serve is to teach others how to help themselves so they can grow by expanding their skills. This approach takes a large commitment of time and energy. Yet it is the only way of serving which breaks the chain of dependency.

This is precisely the philosophy of the Self Help Foundation. Established in Waverly, Iowa in 1959 by Vern Schield, Self Help is a non-profit organization dedicated to assisting hungry people around the world become self-reliant by transferring appropriate agricultural manufacturing capability and farm mechanization services to developing countries. It does this through its simple 12-horsepower diesel tractor and twenty farming implements specifically designed for that technological and economical environment. Introducing agricultural manufacturing and mechanization has been a long, slow process for Self Help because it has had to change thought patterns besides introducing entirely new sets of skills. But Self Help has succeeded in 25 years in bringing its services and equipment to fifty-four countries.

Why is the Self Help Foundation receiving the response it is from people familiar with the needs of developing countries and from people within developing countries? Because it sets people free by sharing new ideas and skills rather than making them dependent on someone else to give them food which will only feed them for a day.

Self Help is built on the idea that farm implements for lesser developed agriculture must be simple to operate and easy to maintain. Its tractor has no hydraulic or electrical system and has an uncomplicated but powerful drive-train.

It attacks the root of hunger with a 3-phase program: During phase one the tractors and equipment are provided to the country for testing, training and use by farmers, and a market study is completed. The testing takes place in the rural areas where the tractor is proposed to be used. The testing continues in every type of soil available in the area. All tests are conducted under the guidance and supervision of Self Help transfer technicians and local authorities.

Phase two provides training in the maintenance and manufacturing. At the beginning of the training program, administrative personnel from the developing country are given all of the data needed to enable them to purchase production machines and inventory required to manufacture the tractor and implements in their country. The final details of the transfer of appropriate technology are worked out prior to their return. Head instructors from developing countries are trained in the skills needed to manufacture the jigs, fixtures, patterns, tractor and implements.

In phase three, centers are established to manufacture the equipment locally and provide training and employment. Since 75 to 95 percent of the population is rural and this is the greatest area of unemployment, the program goes to where the people are. The newly trained instructor and Self Help transfer agent travel back to the developing country where they train the local people to be the teachers and lead personnel in the manufacturing. Formerly unskilled people are building tractors and earning a better income than they ever hoped to earn. People are now getting training that would be unavailable to them anywhere else. Moreover, the tractors they build make the people's lives complete: they know how to use the tractor and the implements, they can repair them and can manufacture their own spare parts, and they have the ability at last to multiply crop yields and provide far more food for their society than they could ever do with hand or animal power.

The story of Self Help demonstrates that appropriate manufacturing technology can be successfully transferred to developing countries. Illiterate and semi-literate people can be trained to manufacture, operate and maintain appropriate equipment. Small tractors can improve farm productivity and raise the net income of farmers in developing countries. Leaders of countless small nations, men in our own foreign assistance programs, in the U.N. and the World Bank, in the A.I.D. programs overseas and elsewhere have praised the work of Vern Schield and the Self Help Foundation. It behooves all of us to study its approaches to the world hunger problem and not only praise it but emulate it.●

VETERANS HEALTH PROGRAMS EXTENSION ACT OF 1985

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to extend two health care programs for veterans which are due to expire in the next 2 years. Last year, the administration requested that legislation similar to this bill be introduced. Because the Subcommittee on Hospitals and Health Care had completed its legislative program prior to the receipt of the administration's request, we deferred action on several of the items contained in that request. I expect that we will hold hearings on this measure in the early part of the 99th Congress.

Section 2 of the bill would extend the VA's authority to contract for care in halfway houses and other community-based treatment facilities for veterans suffering from alcohol or drug dependence or abuse disabilities. Last year, 83 VA medical centers had 297 contracts with halfway houses, therapeutic communities, psychiatric residential treatment centers, and other community-based treatment facilities for such veterans. Over $6 million was expended last year by the Veterans' Administration for this type of care, which benefited nearly 6,000 veterans. This program was initiated by the VA in April, 1980, following the passage of Public Law 96-22.

A recent evaluative report of this program, which is designated as a pilot program, found that the community-based programs serve as a great facilitator for reentry into the community for certain alienated veterans with substance abuse problems. Put in other words, this is a useful program which serves as an adjunct to the very successful in-house program administered by the VA; it provides transitional services to veterans who are in the final stages of treatment for substance abuse problems. The VA noted that despite higher initial treatment costs, the program appeared to be effective in reducing expenditures for subsequent treatment.

Section 3 would extend the authorization for appropriations to a program which is one of the truly effective and respected Federal-State sharing programs. I have spoken to many of my colleagues about the veterans' program which grants States up to 65 percent of the cost of constructing or remodeling facilities which provide nursing home and domiciliary care to older veterans. While I believe that there may be a more efficient way of authorizing these funds to insure that we are making grants where the need is greatest, I want to insure that this program continues to operate without any interruption. Thus, I am introducing this measure to extend the life of this program for an additional 3 years.

I urge my colleagues to support this measure.●

COOPERATIVE EAST-WEST VENTURES

HON. BERYL ANTHONY, JR.

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, before we find ourselves deeply involved in the immediate and pressing problems of budgets, taxes, spending cuts, and other current issues, I want to briefly highlight one piece of legislation from the 98th Congress which has the potential effect of improving relations between the United States and the U.S.S.R. I refer to Public Law 98-562 which encourages cooperative East-West ventures in space, including a possible joint space mission to Mars.

In the December issue of Omni magazine, Senator SPARK M. MATSUNAGA of Hawaii discussed this issue in the most compelling terms. Unless we find greater areas of cooperation which can transcend the rivalries and divisiveness between East and West, the human species may be doomed to eventual self-extinction. It is courage and vision which are needed now to seize this opportunity and push ahead in the area where cooperation is possible now.

Senator MATSUNAGA has exercised great leadership in this issue already, and his article in Omni points the direction we need to go. I urge my colleagues to read it and reflect upon its message.

The article follows:

FIRST WORD

"The custodians of the real world will dismiss an international Mars mission proposal as naive, but I hope they will pause first and recall the universal story of the newborn child." The holiday season, with its eternal theme of peace on Earth and goodwill among all people, is profoundly relevant to our dawning Space Age.

I first learned about such values from my father, a Shinto priest, and had them reinforced when I later embraced the Christian faith. The follower of any other tradition—Jew, Moslem, Hindu, Buddhist—would recognize these beliefs as well. For they are embodied in the universal story of the divine birth—the joyously received entry into the world of a child destined to bring salvation to a suffering humanity.

The divinely conceived child personifies a uniquely human capacity for spiritual transcendence. Other species accept and live out their Darwinian fates. But humanity constantly transcends its condition by inspired feats of the imagination that the reasoning mind translates into working reality. Thus, although we lack wings, we fly in space; although we lack gills, we swim to the bottom of the sea; when our hearts fail, we revive them or even replace them.

But if science is an active participant in the human quest for transcendence, it is the spiritual impulse that defines the goal, the purpose of human striving, and the ultimate promise of salvation.

The one goal that inspires humanity's greatest achievements is, to my mind, unity. From Einstein's search for a unified-field theory, to Mozart's sublime harmonies, to the exquisitely balanced architecture of the Parthenon, humanity's most inspired achievements have always evoked transcendent unity. By contrast, our Darwinian "real world" continually succumbs to primitive impulses for dominance, divisiveness, and war, which we helplessly rationalize and romanticize.

So two antithetical impulses struggle for ascendancy within each individual, each culture. One, determininistic and bestial, drives us to disunity; the other transcendent and spiritual, inspires us to unity.

And now, I believe, the age-old struggle between these two forces enters what may be its final chapter. The setting is the cosmos itself. Here on our tiny microbe of a planet, humanity stands poised to launch a new age of limitless discovery. But we cannot hope to populate the cosmos as long as we carry within us the seed of dominance, divisiveness, and self-destruction. Unless we first transcend our worser selves, we are doomed.

That is the context in which currently fashionable visions of the future need to be examined. Any suggestion that our greatest scientific minds should be mobilized in a national effort dedicated to finding newer and jazzier outlets for base, primitive fantasies, rationalized in a thousand ways, denies the noblest aspirations of American intelligence and imagination. Such thinking strikes at the very essence of our religious ideals. We cannot attain transcendent unity with a video-game vision of the future.

Already, the greatest visionaries of the Space Age have rejected man's baser instincts. Arthur C. Clarke, for example, has written that we must replace the "technological obscenities" of a star-wars defense with the "technological decency" of an international space effort. In the same vein, Isaac Asimov calls for globalism rather than tribalism in the Space Age. These literary prophets know that even as fantasy, the star-wars program is a second-rate production, a perversion of the uniquely human capacity to create transcendent forms that unify.

It is the task of political leaders to translate such visions into policies that will set this nation on a new and more promising course. It should be a course that future generations, endless future generations, can pursue with wonder and zeal.

In that spirit, I introduced legislation proposing a joint U.S.-Soviet program consisting of space missions of gradually increasing complexity, linked to a moratorium on space-weapons testing. These ventures would build toward an international manned mission to Mars in the twenty-first century. The program would unfold in the same time frame as star wars but at far less cost and with far more promise. In contrast to star wars, which polarizes scientific inquiry on the frontier of space, an international Mars mission—a 16-month voyage into space—would enlist the world's best scientists and engineers in a united enterprise, the most stirring undertaking in human history. Indeed, while pursuing this new path of exploration and discovery, Americans and Soviets might even rediscover their common humanity.

No doubt the administrators and custodians of our self-absorbed "real world" will be tempted to dismiss an international Mars mission proposal as naive; but I hope they will pause first, set their legal pads and briefing papers aside, and recall the universal story of the newborn child.

What was it that brought the three wise men to Bethlehem on Christmas Day? Was it to hear yet another lecture on the self-perpetuation complexities of the "real world"? Of course not. They came to behold the promise of something new and divinely inspired, a new wisdom that offered rebirth for a multitude of people.

Similarly, we need to ask. Does this new idea fit the need? Is it what our nascent Space Age requires? If the answer is yes, then we should have the courage to take the necessary initiatives in the policy sphere.

An international Mars mission would herald the birth of a new, transcendent age. Mankind's highest aspirations in art, science, and religion would be finally realized. The beast of divisiveness would be securely caged as humanity began a journey into the cosmos, unified at last.●

A TRIBUTE TO FELIX R. NEVAREZ

HON. MATTHEW G. MARTINEZ

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, it is truely an honor to bring to your attention the valuable contributions made by Mr. Felix R. Nevarez to his community and especially to the young people of Los Angeles.

Mr. Nevarez owns his own business which is known as "Felix's Pantry" and located in Montebello, CA. Felix was the third of 11 children born to Francisco and Natividad Navarez. He attended Mariana Elementary School, Belvedere Junior High School, Roosevelt High School, Los Angeles City College, and University of California at Los Angeles. Felix and his wife have been married for 44 years. They have three daughters and eight grandchildren.

The family and friends of Felix R. Nevarez have arranged an honorary dinner on his behalf and I would like to take this opportunity to share with you some of the hard work and unselfish giving that has distinguished Felix and has prompted this special recognition.

Felix first became involved with the organization of the East Los Angeles Youth Band in the hopes of providing activites for, and developing the talents of, our cities young people. The fundraisers for band uniforms and instruments required many hours of organization and hard work but the results were an award-winning band that gave pride and a feeling of self-worth to many children in the east Los Angeles area. Later, Felix expanded this program to include a topnotch drill team.

The work that Felix has done for St. Michaels, a monastery in Bell Gardens, CA, has been considerable. The monastery would hold fundraiser dinners twice a year at which Felix would cook and serve the food to all the guests.

Aside from these contributions Felix has been active in the Boy Scouts of America organization. And it is this service that is mainly responsible for the honorary dinner held for him. No other action can better illustrate Mr. Nevarez's commitment to the youth of Los Angeles. This organization seems to embody all that is admirable in community service for the youth. Felix's latest efforts have been directed toward the procurement of equipment for summer camps, food for numerous meals which have been enjoyed by many Scouts at their various functions. In general, Felix has been a dedicated and forceful personality behind the Boy Scout organization in the Los Angeles area.

Mr. Speaker, Felix Nevarez may not have contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars to assist the youth of Los Angeles, but he has given something of even more value and often harder to share. Felix has given himself, his time, his energy and his commitment to the building strong foundations for our children's development.●

SSI CHANGES TO PROTECT SHELTERED WORKSHOP PARTICIPANTS

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation I originally filed in the last Congress which would make necessary changes to the SSI law so as not to penalize recipients whose incomes, because of the nature of their disabilities, may be spasmodic or uneven throughout the year.

Under current SSI regulations, all beneficiaries must have their income redetermined on a monthly basis to establish whether their income was over the amount allowed under the program. If such a determination is made, the receipient's benefits are then reduced by one-half the amount of the coverage.

While I have no quarrel with their being income limitations set, the monthly redetermination works an unfair hardship on those disabled persons whose incomes vary greatly from month to month. This is particularly true in the case of those participating in sheltered workshop programs. By their very nature, the amount of work to be done in these workshops varies greatly from month to month and since the participants of these programs are paid generally on a piecework basis, their incomes necessarily fluctuate with the amount of work to be done by the workshop. It is not uncommon, for instance, for a workshop to be very busy in the months preceding the Christmas season, but to be very slow in the months thereafter.

The problem that affects the disabled people—and in particular, the mentally retarded—who work in these programs is that while their annual incomes may well not exceed the annual income allowed without penalty under the SSI program, their income during several busy months may exceed the limits when that annual income limitation is divided by 12. The result is that the monthly SSI check is reduced and that reduction is not recouped in a low-earning month. Thus, even though the individual's annual earnings may not exceed the income limits, he or she is penalized because of the monthly accounting process.

The legislation I am introducing would rectify this situation by providing that in determining the amount of the SSI benefit for disabled individuals engaged in sheltered workshop employment or for those whose income is irregular or spasmodic, monthly income shall be assumed to be equal to the average monthly income over a year. This process will still allow an income limitation to be maintained but will result in fairer treatment for those whose income is uneven throughout the year.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend Barbara Turner, the past president of the Association for Clients of People, Inc., in Fall River, MA, for bringing this very unfair situation to my attention. Ms. Turner is a very dedicated individual who has taken the time to learn the very complicated laws and regulations that affect the disabled people she so ably assists. I am very greatful for her help in introducing this legislation.●

VETERANS DAY 1984

HON. STEWART B. McKINNEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, after the last Congress adjourned, our Nation celebrated its annual observance of Veterans Day on the 12th day of November. At that time the people and the veterans of this country gathered to remember and to honor those who had fought in the various wars in which the United States had participated. In groupings large and small around the country, they recalled the valor, the pain, the glory, and, oftentimes, the death of family members and companions.

Here in Washington, the observance of Veterans Day took on a new dimension in 1984. The Vietnam Memorial was completed, dedicated and turned over to the United States and its people. Various Veterans Day activities held on The Mall, while emphasizing the veterans of our most recent war in Vietnam, included also representation of veterans of past wars. The camaraderie exhibited on The Mall demonstrated the common interest of the veterans of every generation. That interest is to maintain forever the United States of America as "the land of the free."

Most of my colleagues were unable to participate in the Veterans Day ceremonies on The Mall, but I would like to share with them a part of the observance which I believe to be a positive sign in the healing process from the Vietnam war. The National Poet Laureate of the Vietnam Veterans of America, Steve Mason, read to the vast crowd that day an excerpt from his work "Johnny's Song." Having served his country in Vietnam, Steve Mason knew a lot of Johnnys. Having known a lot of Johnnys, Steve Mason continues to serve his country.

THE WALL WITHIN, AN EXCERPT FROM JOHNNY'S SONG

(By Steve Mason)

Most real men hanging tough in their early forties would like the rest of us to think they could really handle one more war and two more women.
But I know better.
You have no more lies to tell.
I have no more dreams to believe.

I have seen it in your face
I am sure you have noticed it in mine;
that thousand yard stare that does not look out—it looks in—at the unutterable.
unalterable truth of our war.

The eye sees what the mind believes.
And all that I know of war,
all that I have heard of peace, has me looking over my shoulder for that one bullet which still has my name on it—circling round and round the globe waiting and circling circling and waiting until I break from cover and it takes its best, last shot.
In the absence of Time,
the accuracy of guilt is assured.
It is a cosmic marksman.

Since Vietnam,
I have run a zig zag course across the open fields of America taking refuge in the inner cities.
From MacArthur Park to Washington Square from Centennial Park to DuPont Circle, on the grassy, urban knolls of America
I have seen an army of combat veterans hidden among the trees.
Veterans of all our recent wars.
Each a part of the best of his generation.
Waiting in his teeth for peace.

They do not lurk there on the backs of park benches drooling into their socks above the remote, turtled backs of chessplayers playing soldiers.
They do not perch upon the gutter's lip of midnight fountains and noontime wishing wells like surrealistic gargoyles guarding the coins and simple wishes of young lovers.
No.
I have seen them in the quiet dignity of their aloneness.
Singly, in the confidence of their own perspective.
And always at the edges of the clearing.
Patrolling like perimeter guards, or observing as primitive gods,
each in his own way looks out to the park that he might "see" in to the truth.

Some, like me
enjoy the comfortable base of a friendly tree that we might cock one eye to the center of the park toward the rearing bronze horsemen of other wars who would lead us backwards to glory.
Daily, they are fragged
by a platoon of disgruntled pigeons saying it best for all of us.

And with the other eye,
we read the poetry of America the Beautiful as she combs her noontime hair and eats precise shrimp sandwiches and salad Nicoise catered by Tupperwareand never leaves a single crumb.
No wonder America is the only country in the world which doesn't smell like food.

. . . and I remember you and me picnicing at the side of the Ho Chi Minh Trail in the rain eating the Limas and Ham from the can sitting easy in our youth and our strength driving hard bargains with each other for the C-ration goodies
we unwrapped like Christmas presents.
Somwhow it really seemed to matter what he got versus what you got.
It wasn't easy trading cheese and crackers for chocolate covered peanut butter cookies!
And the pound cake—Forget about it!
I knew a guy would cut a hole in it and pretend it was a doughnut.
For six months I watched that and refused to ask him about it.
I did finally. And you guessed it.
He hated pound cake.
And remember the water biscuit that came in its own tin?-
I think they had the moxie to call it a cookie—it came with the marmalade and was made by that outfit in Chicago
we promised to burn to the ground someday.
Damn, how did your buddy, the animal,
ever eat that crap?
Then, we'd happily wash down the whole mess with freckly-faced strawberry kool-aid straight from the canteen some days there'd be goofy grape (anything to keep from choking on the taste of purified water).
Bleck.
But somehow I sensed all the while that I'd never be able to forgive myself for enjoying your company so much or being so good at the game we played.

We were the best—You & I.

In our parks,
there are whole other armies of veterans mostly young and mostly old but always ageless who are not alone.
They share with their families and their friends these open-aired above-ground time capsules of our national culture.
They read aloud to themselves and their children from the plaques and statues monuments and markers those one-line truths of our common experience as if there could be a real significance in words like Love and Hate tattooed on the clenched, granite fists of America.

Sometimes, when I am angry
it seems as if I could start my own country with the same twenty Spill and Spell words we shake out at the feet of our heroes like some crone spreading her hands over the runes prior to a mystic reading.
Words like:
peace and sacrifice, war and young supreme and duty, service and honor country, nation, men and men and men again, sometimes God and don't forget women!
Army, Air Force, Navy, Marines and freedom.

Then, just as quickly, the anger passes and reverence takes its place.
Those are good words, noble words, solemn & sincere.
It is the language of Death which frightens me;
it is unearthly to speak life concepts
over the dead.
Death is inarticulately final refusing forever to negotiate.

That, and the awesome responsibility we place eternally on our fallen teenage sons, seems unbearably heavy against the lengthening, prancing shadows of Sunday's frisbeers.

Apparently, there is no period which can be placed after sacrifice.
All life is struggle.
An act of natural balance and indomitable courage.
As it is with man
so it is with mankind.

If we permit Memorial Day to come to us every day, we ignore the concept of sacrifice and dilute its purpose.
When we do that we incur the responsibility to effect change.
If we are successful,
the sacrifice has renewed meaning.
It seems there is no alternative to life.
But there may be to war. . .

The values of our society seem to be distributed in our parks and reflected in the eyes of veterans who look there for validation and find only confusion and sadness.
Strange, I have observed no monuments to survivors.
No obelisk to mark the conflict of those who risked and lived perhaps to fight again or perhaps to speak of peace.
Nowhere, yet, a wall for the living.
There is no wonder guilt is the sole survivor of war.
We do not celebrate life after combat because our concept of glory lives neither in victory nor in peace but in Death.

There are plagues at the doorsteps of skyscrapers;
in New York on 10th and the Avenue
of the Americas it reads:

IN MEMORY OF THOSE FROM GREENWICH VILLAGE WHO MADE THE SUPREME SACRIFICE IN THE KOREAN CONFLICT, 1950-1953

In Nashville's Centennial Park in a shaded wood to one side of the Parthenon built to scale and to the glory which was Greece,
a small statue stands;
it is inscribed:

I GAVE MY BEST TO MAKE A BETTER WORLD, 1917-1918

I stood there one fall ankle deep in leaves and looked up at the night sky through a hole in a ceiling of trees wondering how much better the world might look from up there.

From the moon
only one mandate object can be viewed by the naked eye;
The Great Wall of China
(a tribute to man's functional paranoia)
It's a peculiar perspective because we're a lot closer and the only manmade object We can see is THE Wall in Washington, D.C.
(a veterans solemn pledge to remember)
There is one other wall, of course.
One we never speak of.
One we never see,
One which separates memory from madness.
In a place no one offers flowers.
THE WALL WITHIN.
We permit no visitors.

Mine looks like any of a million nameless, brick walls—
it stands in the tear-down ghetto of my soul; that part of me which reason avoids for fear of dirtying its clothes and from atop which my sorrow and my rage hurl bottles and invectives at the rolled-up windows of my passing youth.

Do you know the wall I mean?

I learned of mine that night in the rain
when I spoke at the Memorial in Washington.
We all noticed how the wall ran like tears and every man's name we found on the polished, black granite face seemed to have our eyes staring back at us; crying.
It was haunting.
Later I would realize
I had caught my first glimpse of the Wall Within.
And those tears were real.

You and I do not walk about the Wall Within like Hamlet on the battlements.
No one with our savvy would expose himself like that especially to a frightened, angry man.
Suicide loiters in our subconscious and bears a grudge; an assassin on hashish. We must be wary.
No. We sit there legless in our immobility rolling precariously in our self-pity like ugly Humpty Dumpties with disdain even for the King's horses as we lean over the ledge to write upside down with chalk, bleached white with our truth the names of all the other casualties of the Vietnam War
(our loved ones)
the ones the Pentagon didn't put in uniform
but died anyway.
Some because they stopped being who they always were just as truly as if they'd found another way to breathe.
Others, because they did die honest-to-God casualties of the Vietnam War
because they lost the will to breathe at all.

My mother gave her first recital at Carnegie Hall at age eleven.
Sometimes, when I was a boy
I'd watch her play the piano and wonder if God, after all, was not a woman.
One evening when I was in the bush
she turned on the 6:00 news and died of a heart attack.

My mother's name is on the Wall Within.

You starting to get the idea?
Our lists may be different but shoulder to shoulder
if we could find the right flat cloud on a perfect, black night we could project our images upon a god-sized drive-in theatre wide enough to race Ben Hur across for a thousand years . . .

Because the Wall Within adds up the true cost of war . . .

We can recite 58,012 in our sleep even the day after they update it, but how many of those KIA had kids?
How many of them got nice step-dads?

Whose wall do they go on?
And what about you vets who came home to your wife and kids only to divorce her because there wasn't anybody else to be angry at?
How many dimes have you long-distance fathers dropped into the slot to hear how another man was raising your children?
Yeah, Yeah, I can hear you hollerin',
"Put it on the wall! Put it on the wall!"
Damn right, it's on the wall . . .
And you remember how that came down?
You told the three year old his daddy loved him and his mommy loved him and nothing would ever change that.
But it did anyway.
But not because you didn't love him enough, but because you loved him too much to be a part-time daddy.
And you couldn't explain that to him because you couldn't explain it to you.
What the hell? I mean who were you,
Spinoza? You came home a twenty-two year old machine gunner for chrissake, you did the best you could.
PUT IT ON THE WALL!!
And somewhere, in an art gallery, maybe,
is a portrait of American Grieving Parenthood.
Handholding, Rockwellian caricatures of wisdom and forbearance and oh yes, pride sitting on the front porch of the township waving their lemonades at the Greyhound bus driver.
Baloney. The names go UP!
Because every time you can't find Mom, you damned well better call Doc Smith
'cause she's up on the second floor again sitting on the floor in Johnny's closet smelling his Varsity sweater with the sleeves around her shoulders sobbing something maybe only Johnny ever understood.
But don't worry about dad,
who never fished again,
or watched a ballgame on TV again and won't talk to anyone this year between the ages of thirty and forty.
He's doing fine.
He just doesn't exercise
as much as he should,
but Doc Smith assures us there's no medical reason why the folks should have separate bedrooms;
Dad just likes to read a lot these days.
If you and I were men of common conscience we might agree on a collective dedication to our Walls Within.
As for me
they could all read:
This wall is dedicated to mothers, fathers, sisters, brothers, wives, husbands,
sons, daughters, lovers, friends and most of all dreams of the men and women who risked it all in Vietnam while you continued to lose them during and after the war with less a chance than they for a parade and no chance at all for an explanation.
You lost them to bullets, internment, drugs, suicide, alcohol, jail, PTS,
Divorce, but never never did any of you ever lose them to the truth which is now being shared across this great nation in such an act of spontaneous moral courage, its like may never have been seen on any battlefield in the history of mankind . . .
Amen to that, brother.●

YOUNG AND STELLA LOUIS—OUR LONGEST MARRIED COUPLE

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform my colleagues that a search by Worldwide Marriage Encounter in honor of World Marriage Day has turned up Young and Stella Louis of San Luis Obispo as the longest married couple in California's San Luis Obispo, Monterey, and Santa Cruz Counties. Young and Stella celebrated their 72d wedding anniversary on December 31, and they seem headed for many more years of wedded happiness.

Young Louis is the oldest of eight children of Ah Louis, who first came to California in 1860, and Gon Ying of San Francisco. They settled in San Luis Obispo, where Young was born in 1893. Stella Louis was born in 1897 in Berkeley, CA, at a time when there were very few Chinese women permitted in the United States. Young and Stella met at a church bazaar in San Francisco early in 1912, when they were both in their teens. They were married at the end of the year in First Christian Church in San Luis Obispo.

Over the years, Young worked in a number of theaters in San Luis Obispo. He attended California Polytechnic State University, where he majored in electrical engineering, and graduated in 1923. For several years, Young served as secretary of the Cal Poly's Alumni Association, and in 1960, he was named "alumnus of the year." He received a special Mustang Award from Cal Poly students in 1968.

Young and Stella have been very active in community affairs and have taken a special interest in historical preservation efforts in San Luis Obispo. More than 30 years ago, they founded the San Luis Obispo County Historical Society, and they have worked to make it a success.

Mr. Speaker, Young and Stella Louis have had a long life together. We can all share in their pride and love and aspire to such strong commitment in our own lives. Young and Stella are still very active in the community, and there is every reason to believe that their marriage has many more years to go. I know my colleagues join me in congratulating them and wishing them the best of everything in the future.●

JOE RAUH: 50 YEARS, AND COUNTING, OF DOING GOOD

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of my colleagues an article which appeared in the New York Times on January 8, 1985. Entitled "Joe Rauh: 50 Years, and Counting, of Doing Good," the article looks at Joe Rauh's extraordinary lifetime commitment to the fight for civil rights and civil liberties.

His is a commitment which has never faltered, and one which has brought this country closer to the ideals of equality and justice embodied in our Constitution.

I've always felt honored to count Joe as one of my friends. This article captures some of the reasons why Joe's friendship is a special treasure. I was particularly taken by Joe's comments to a group of young college students:

To the extent that there is a valley in the efforts toward equality today, it results from a national fatigue based on the unprecedented efforts of recent decades. But one can hope—no, expect—that this too will pass, that batteries will be recharged and that increased racial tolerance will spark new gains of which future generations will be as proud as we are of ours.

I hope my colleagues will read the article that follows and be inspired, as I have been, by Joe's remarkable example.

JOE RAUH: 50 YEARS, AND COUNTING, OF DOING GOOD

(By David E. Rosenbaum)

WASHINGTON, January 7.—Fifty years ago, Joseph L. Rauh, Jr. came to Washington to, in his words, "work for the New Deal." He has been doing it ever since.

"There was a spirit in 1935 that has never come again," Mr. Rauh said the other day, reflecting on his years here. "You had to be in it to believe it. The idealism was so great. We had night secretaries. We would work all night. We thought we were saving the country, and, you know, I think we really were."

Many of his peers from those days have turned against liberalism and the Government's social welfare programs, becoming "neoliberals" or even outright conservatives. Mr. Rauh has not done that.

Many used their Government connections to become wealthy. Mr. Rauh never did that either.

And most, perhaps nearly all, are now dead or retired. In contrast, at age 74, Joe Rauh is practicing law full time, suing the Central Intelligence Agency, lobbying in Congress for compensation for Japanese Americans who were interned in World War II, defending the civil liberties of a Congressman caught up in Abscam, speaking out for busing and affirmative action and devoting himself to the causes—some popular, most not—that have been his life.

LIKE AN ANTHOLOGY OF LIBERALISM

A list of those causes reads like an anthology of American liberalism.

In the 1930's he was law clerk to Justices Benjamin N. Cardozo and Felix Frankfurter on the Supreme Court and counsel to several of the alphabet agencies of the New Deal.

In the 1940's, after serving on Gen. Douglas MacArthur's staff in the Pacific, he was an organizer of Americans for Democratic Action and a principal author of the historic civil rights plank in the 1948 Democratic platform.

By the 1950's he had become the nation's best known civil liberties lawyer, a sworn enemy of McCarthyism, and his clients included the playwrights Lillian Hellman and Arthur Miller and Walter Reuther's United Auto Workers.

In the 1960's Mr. Rauh represented the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. He pounded the halls of Congress, incessantly, without pay, and it was said that the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and the Fair Housing Act of 1968 would never been enacted without his lobbying. Two photographs commemorating those days hang side-by-side in his office.

His most prominent client in the 1970's was Joseph A. Yablonski, who challenged W.A. Boyle's leadership of the United Mine Workers. After Mr. Yablonski, his wife and their daughter were found slain, Mr. Rauh forced a Federal investigation that concluded that the deaths had been instigated by the union leadership.

"Other people may have made more money," Mr. Rauh said, looking back at his career. "But no one has had more fun."

And it is the fun, not the battles, that Joe Rauh likes to talk about.

Like the time in 1957 when Arthur Miller, who was then married to Marilyn Monroe, was on trail for contempt for Congress for refusing to identify for the House Un-American Activites Committee writers he knew to be Communists.

BREAKFAST WITH MARILYN MONROE

"He called me up the day before the trial was going to begin," Mr. Rauh recalled, "and said, 'What am I going to do with my wife? She can't stay in a hotel. They would tear her apart.'

"I said, 'Why don't you stay with us?' I remember going home that night and saying to Carl [one of his sons, now a criminal trial lawyer here], who was then 16, 'You've got to go to the station tomorrow and pick up Marilyn Monroe.' You can't imagine his expression.

"That first morning at breakfast, Carl and I knocked ourselves over going to the kitchen to get her a glass of water. She stayed with us for two weeks, and the day before the trial ended, word got out somehow she was at our house. When Carl got home from school, there were people all over the lawn, and he went out and held a news conference.

"At the end, some reporter, from The Star, I think, said, 'Well, in sum, Carl, what's it like to have Marilyn Monroe around the house?'

"And Carl said, 'It ain't quite like living with your brother.' "

HELLMAN AND SHREWDNESS

Five years earlier, Mr. Rauh had represented Lillian Hellman when she was subpoenaed by the Un-American Activities Committee. In "Scoundrel Time," her book about that era, Miss Hellman wrote: "I liked Rauh. Shrewdness seldom goes with an open nature, but in his case it does and the nice, unbeautiful, rugged, crinkly face gives one confidence about the mind above it."

What Mr. Rauh remembers most about that case is that he composed Miss Hellman's now-famous letter to the committee. That is, he composed all but one sentence: "I cannot and will not cut my conscience to fit this year's fashions." Miss Hellman wrote that sentence. It is what made the letter famous, and it is all most people remember about it now.

Of all the civil rights leaders he dealt with, Mr. Rauh (his name rhymes with "wow") has perhaps the fondest memories of A. Philip Randolph, the long-time head of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. "Mr. Randolph—I never called him anything but Mr. Randolph—was the most dignified man who ever lived," Mr. Rauh said.

He recalled the day in the 1950's when he and Mr. Randolph won an important civil rights victory: "Afterward, we were on the corner of 14th and K, and I said, 'Mr. Randolph, we ought to have a drink to celebrate.'

"He said, 'Yes, Mr. Raw'—he never could get my name straight—'but where should we go?'

"I had to think. Finally, I said, 'There are two places we can go, to the railroad station, or you can come to my house.'

"He just shrugged and said, 'Mr. Raw. You and I have just had a symbolic drink.' "

Mr. Rauh says he tells that story not so much to make the point that there was almost nowhere in Washington back then where a black man and a white man could sit down together, but to illustrate Mr. Randolph's dignity.

'THIS TOO WILL PASS'

It concerns him, Mr. Rauh said, that young people today seem antipathetic to the causes that have driven him all his life. "It makes you sick," he said, to hear that law students today are more interested in doing well than in doing good.

But, ever the optimist, he says he believes it is only a matter of time before the social and political winds shift again. Last fall he delivered a lecture at Clinch Valley College of the University of Virginia on "The Future of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties in America." He left the students with this thought:

"To the extent that there is a valley in the efforts toward equality today, it results from a national fatigue based on the unprecedented efforts of recent decades. But one can hope—no, expect—that this too will pass, that batteries will be recharged and that increased racial tolerance will spark new gains of which future generations will be as proud as we are of ours."●

A TRIBUTE TO CHARLES E. "COMMANDO" KELLY

HON. WILLIAM J. COYNE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, the city of Pittsburgh lost a favorite son recently with the passing of Charles E. "Commando" Kelly.

Kelly, a resident of my city's north side, received a Congressional Medal of Honor for his heroic, single-handed World War II encounter with a German infantry platoon during the Battle of Salerno. The description that accompanied his Medal of Honor uses just a few words to describe an action which saved many lives. It says that:

Corporal. Kelly took a position at an open window of the storehouse. One machine gunner had been killed at this position and several other soldiers wounded. Cpl. Kelly delivered continuous aimed and effective fire upon the enemy with his automatic rifle until the weapon locked from overheating. Finding another automatic rifle, he again directed effective fire upon the enemy until this weapon also locked.

The description went on to say:

At this critical point, with the enemy threatening to overrun the position, Cpl. Kelly picked up the 60 mm mortar shells, pulled the safety pins, and used the shells as grenades. When it become imperative that the house be evacuated, Cpl. Kelly volunteered to hold the position until the remainder of his detachment could withdraw. As the detachment moved out, Corporal Kelly was observed deliberately loading and firing a rocket launcher from the window. He was successful in covering the withdrawal of the unit.

Each of us, I am sure, hopes, that something in our lives, something that we have done, or perhaps chose not to do, will cause those who follow us to recognize that we met the tests our particular era put before us. Cpl. Kelly met his test. He is remembered and honored, in Pittsburgh and elsewhere, for the example he set. At this point, I include in the RECORD material on the life of Corporal Kelly.

The material follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Press]

CHARLES "COMMANDO" KELLY

He didn't even have the medals any more.

He gave all 11 of them—including the Medal of Honor—away over the years to hero worshippers.

Charles "Commando" Kelly didn't have much left at all, save his memories of war and the feeling that he didn't fit in much with peace.

He was a drifter, a survivor who took the knocks as they came. He absorbed, fell, bounced and absorbed again for more than 40 years, never quite able to cope with life, maybe because he had seen too much of death.

"Commando" Kelly earned the medals, his fame was forced on him.

His name became a household word in the mid-1940s. Children who played war all wanted to be "Commando" Kelly. Their parents lined the streets when he was paraded through his native North Side, a hero coming home to face a civilian life that was a constant downhill slide.

The slide ended Friday at the Oakland Veterans Administration Hospital, a bowel obstruction taking the life that an entire platoon of German soldiers at Altavilla, Italy, or the rain of bullets and shrapnel at the Salerno beachhead and the Rapido River could not.

But the memories of those battles—just two years ago he recited the names of some of his buddies who were killed trying to cross the Rapido—were still vivid, undimmed by the passage of years.

The hero survived the war, but not the memories.

But then, does anybody ever survive memories of pure hell?

[From the New York Times]

CHARLES E. KELLY DIES AT 64; A WINNER OF MEDAL OF HONOR

(By Marvine Howe)

Charles E. Kelly, the World War II hero known as Commando Kelly, died Friday at the Veterans Administration Hospital in Pittsburgh after a bowel operation. He was 64 years old.

Mr. Kelly, who was living as an obscure self-employed house painter in Pittsburgh, his hometown, was the first enlisted man to receive the Medal of Honor in the war. He was awarded the medal for single-handedly fighting off a German platoon, enabling his own detachment to withdraw safely from Altavilla, Italy, on Sept 1, 1943

Technical Sergeant Kelly's act, in which he killed 40 enemy troops, became one of the most talked about events of the war.

INTREPIDITY IN BATTLE

Lieut. Gen. Mark W. Clark, who commanded the Fifth Army in the campaign, honored Sergeant Kelly with this country's highest award. The citation praised him for "fighting determination and intrepidity in battle."

On his return to the United States, he was welcomed with a parade on Pittsburgh's North Side and given the keys to the city. He had won 10 other medals for valor.

Mr. Kelly earned $40,000 for a book on his exploits, "One Man's War," which was made into a film. Excerpts from the book were published in a The Saturday Evening Post.

"It was tough trying to see all my old friends, what with parades and being given a gold-plated key to the city and having to show up here and there, but I got around to seeing them anyhow," he wrote in The Post article, referring to his return,

"And when I went to bed or when things were a little quieter than at other times, I thought about some of the G.I.'s I'd left back on the other side. They knew we couldn't lose. Every soldier over there knows we are going to win. The only thing they don't know is how long it is going to take."

Very soon, however, misfortune befell Mr. Kelly. His first wife, May Boish of Pittsburgh, died of cancer, and he married again and was later divorced.

Mr. Kelly ran a gasoline station and then became a house painter. He and his family moved to Louisville, Ky., in 1955, where he lived in a public housing project. Finally, a group of friends collected funds to bring him home to Pittsburgh's North Side in the early 1970's, where he lived for the rest of his life.

Mr. Kelly is survived by three sons, Charles E. Kelly Jr. of North Carolina, William Bennette of California and Michael W. Gaskins of Indiana; three daughters, Virginia Shepherd of Kentucky and Jerrie Lynn Stangehellini and Lee Maxwell Kelly of California, and five brothers, James, George, John, Edward and Howard of Pittsburgh.

A funeral service will be held at 10 A.M., tomorrow at the Sperling Funeral Home in Pittsburgh. He will be buried in the Highwood Cemetery.●

THE 67TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE IN UKRAINE

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday, January 22, the free world celebrated the 67th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of Ukraine. It was on that date in 1918, that this proclamation was made in Kiev, the capital of Ukraine.

Following this declaration, the sovereign of Ukraine struggled for 3 years against the Russian Bolsheviks. They succumbed to the aggressor who established in Ukraine a Communist government know as the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Under the Communist rule, millions of Ukrainians of the free world drew attention to the 50th anniversary of the manmade famine which caused the death of 7 million Ukrainians. The churches in Ukraine have also been destroyed; the clergy and faithful persecuted. The Ukrainians are now totally controlled and directed by Moscow.

Arrests, trials, convictions of thousands of Ukrainians charged with anti-Soviet propoganda and agitation have been made. Unfair trials and harsh sentences have been given to members of the Ukrainian Helsinki accord monitoring groups. Extended prison terms are now being given to dissident writers.

Ukrainians refuse to accept the cruel foreign domination which plagues them, the alteration of their language, the elimination of their culture, destruction of their churches, and the ruination of their country.

Each year throughout the United States, January 22 is proclaimed as Ukrainian Independence Day. It is in the spirit of liberty, faith, and justice that America gives support to the Ukrainian people. So, today I join with my colleagues in the Congress in tribute to the people of Ukraine in their continued struggle for human rights.●

LOW-TEMPERATURE GEOTHERMAL TAX CREDITS

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would provide tax credits for the purchase and installation of equipment to tap low-temperature geothermal energy. The bill would also excuse any tax or interest due from those taxpayers who during the last several years mistakenly took the geothermal tax credit for low-temperature geothermal equipment based on erroneous advice from the IRS.

In 1978, Congress enacted the Energy Tax Act, which included a tax credit for the purchase of geothermal energy equipment as well as other conservation and renewable energy tax credits. In layman's terms, geothermal equipment taps the heat found below the surface of the Earth to be used to heat and cool buildings and for various other purposes. The temperature of the geothermal deposits varies greatly, but the most common form of equipment which taps low-temperature geothermal deposits is the heatpump.

When Congress enacted the 1978 geothermal tax credit, no distinction was made between equipment used to draw on high-temperature or low-temperature geothermal deposits, as measured at the wellhead. However, in 1980 the IRS issued regulations prohibiting the use of the credit for equipment drawing on geothermal deposits below 50 °C (122 °F). Geothermal deposits of this temperature are only found in a very few areas of the far West. While Congress enacted the tax credit to encourage the nationwide use of renewable energy sources, the IRS regulations limit the use of the credit to a very small area of the country.

The IRS regulations are clearly contrary to the intent of Congress when we enacted the Energy Tax Act of 1978. Congress intended that taxpayers around the country should be able to take advantage of the geothermal and other renewable energy tax credits. My bill would remove this arbitrary and unwarranted temperature threshold established by the IRS. Thus, ground water heat pumps, which extract energy from shallow underground streams to heat buildings, would be eligible for the credit.

I am of course aware that the geothermal tax credit as well as the other energy tax credits are scheduled to expire this year. However, unless this Congress enacts some form of tax simplification plan which eliminates almost all tax deductions and credits, the energy tax credits should be extended. The geothermal and other energy tax credits provide a valuable incentive to encourage energy conservation and the development of renewable energy sources.

Ground water heat pump systems are considered to be three to five times as efficient as fossil-fuel heating systems in terms of heat output per unit of energy put in. By one estimate, ground water has the capacity to replace fossil fuel heating and electrical cooling in 85 percent of the domestic dwellings in the Northeast-Midwest region alone. Surely, this is the very kind of energy-conserving system that Congress should be encouraging.

In addition, even if a tax simplification plan were enacted, my bill is necessary because it would excuse any tax or interest due from those taxpayers who incorrectly took the tax credit for low-temperature geothermal equipment based on incorrect advice from IRS personnel. After IRS issued its regulations setting the extremely high wellhead temperature requirement for use of the tax credit, IRS field agents seemed unaware of their own regulations and advised taxpayers for several years that low-temperature geothermal equipment qualified for the credit.

Now IRS is demanding that these taxpayers repay the credit plus interest. Some taxpayers in my area called IRS in February of last year, over 4 years after IRS issued their regulations, and were even then informed incorrectly that low-temperature geothermal energy equipment qualified for the credit. Some of my constituents are now being forced to pay as much as $4,000 in tax deficiencies plus interest because they relied on incorrect advice from IRS agents. It is outrageous that taxpayers are now being dunned for the IRS' own mistakes. Taxpayers who can prove that they relied on erroneous advice from the IRS should be excused from paying these huge penalties. I urge my colleagues to carefully consider this important piece of legislation.●

MASON-DIXON GAMES SILVER ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this time to congratulate the Mason-Dixon Athletic Club of Louisville, KY—my hometown—on the 25th presentation of the Mason-Dixon games.

February 1985, marks the silver anniversary of the Mason-Dixon games which, over the years, have produced 53 indoor track and field records and have witnessed many great performances from athletes such as Wilma Rudolph and Billy Olson.

I also wish to extend my congratulations to the many men and women who have dedicated their time and talents over the years to make the Mason-Dixon games successful.

The Mason-Dixon Club will celebrate its silver anniversary on February 9 and, at that time, special recognition will be given to seven individuals who have served as officials in games past: Charles B. Fischer, Letty Walker, Willie Lewis, William G. Long, Jr., Charlie Theobold, Jack Thompson, and Charlie Ruter.

I would add the name of George Gibson to this list. George, a valued friend, died this year, but he was a central force over the years for the Mason-Dixon games.

At this time, I would like to insert the following statement, prepared by the Mason-Dixon Athletic Club, into the RECORD:

SILVER ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION OF THE MASON-DIXON GAMES

1985 marks the 25th presentation of the Mason-Dixon Games conducted in Louisville, Kentucky's beautiful Freedom Hall. Since its inception (1961) these Games and the huge 220 yard oval have been the site of the establishment of 53 world records for indoor track and field.

On the evening of February 18, 1961 when the great Wilma Rudolph graced this track with her world-record performance of 7.8 for the 70 yard dash to the delight of the 9,295 track fans who had gathered to see this first-ever meet in the new facility on the grounds of the Kentucky Fair & Exposition Center, to the Games latest world record established by that fabulous athlete from Abliene Christian University in Texas, pole vaulter Billy Olson, who on a very cold winter night soared over the bar at 18'9¼' to earn his glory, these Games have been a very integral part of the winter sports scene in the Louisville community.

In the beginning, the Games were sponsored by the old Kentuckiana Cinder Club, Inc. but as time wore on and "cinders" became obsolete in their use for running tracks, the organization name was "modernized" to fit all situations, thus the group and club became "Mason-Dixon Athletic Club", to more closely associate itself with the name of the meet.

During its rein the Games have presented to the public over 72 athletes who went on to earn positions on America's Olympic teams. Of that total number 21 of them helped to establish those 53 world indoor track & field records. In last year's meet (1984) ten athlete's made the Olympic Games, three of them earned medals . . . LT. Alonzo Babers (Air Force Academy) won the gold at 400 meters; Sam Graddy of Tennessee won a silver medal in the 100 meters, the pole vaulter Earl Bell earned a bronze medal, while Jim Heiring participating in the Olympic Games 20K walk failed to earn a medal he was an important factor in Ray Sharp establishing a new American record of 11:16.3 at the Mason-Dixon because he pushed up the record with his own 11:15.5 . . . finishing a strong second behind Sharp.

Throughout the 24 years of the Games career, over 24,000 high school youngsters have participated, of which, some 3400 went on to become collegiate stars in their own right. Probably the brightest of these high school stars was Stepanie Hightower. While a prep star and state champion during her career at Jesse Stuart High School in Jefferson County, she went on to become one of the Big Ten's all-time hurdle and long jump champions. In 1980 she earned a spot on the Olympic teams, but the team did not participate in the Moscow Games. She has won every American honor during her hurdle years, and plans to continue in competition again in 1985.

On Saturday evening, February 9, 1985, the Mason-Dixon Athletic Club of Louisville, Kentucky plans to remember those 24 glorious meets when they honor seven officials who have served so long and faithful. They include: Charles B. Fischer, current president of the club; Letty Walter of New Albany, Indiana; Veteran Finish Line Head Judge, Willie Lewis; Two distinguished timers, William G. Long, Jr. (now Head Timer), and Charles J. Theobold; Jack Thompson, Games records clerk and longtime swimming director of Lakeside Club, and Charlie Ruter, who in the 1984 Olympic Games served as Jumping Referee.

This is one event that comes to this community annually and brings forth the true spirit and dignity of true amateur athletics.●

DECENT ACTS OCCUR DAILY

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, a recent article by Jack Anderson entitled "Decent Acts, Little Noted, Occur Daily" is worth repeating, not only for its specific context but also for the thrust toward acknowledging good acts, stating good things about America and its leaders. There needs to be more of such articles, and I congratulate Jack Anderson on this one and on other positive things that he has brought to the attention of the American people throughout his long journalist career.

DECENT ACTS, LITTLE NOTED, OCCUR DAILY

(By Jack Anderson)

Our world is being vandalized and poisoned by tidy specialists who scrupulously obey the codes of their narrow professions but claim no responsibility to larger realms.

They include chemists whose wonders foul the air and seas; economists whose rules speed the materialistic changes that are obliterating social mores with catastrophic effect; agri-scientists who would destroy the land tomorrow so that it might yield a bigger crop today; lawyers who complicate their procedures while justice languishes; and politicians who, in the name of getting more for their districts, bankrupt the commonwealth.

Journalists suffer from the same myopic vision, focusing too often on the narrow story at the expense of the broader truth, revealing only the thorns instead of the full rosebush.

As my small Christmas offering, let me remind readers that the people who govern us are no better or worse than the rest of us. Most politicians and bureaucrats are honest, honorable and hard-working. Nor is it always easy to separate the political wheat from the chaff. The sellout one day may be the holdout the next.

Acts of decency are daily routine in Washington—and seldom the subject of press releases. Here are just a few of them:

Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) used his considerable clout to make Amie Garrison's wish come true. Amie, 5, is in a Louisville children's hospital waiting for a liver donor. She wanted to hang her favorite ornament, a silver Santa Claus, on the White House Christmas tree. Her request was forwarded to Lugar's office, and the senator called the letter to President Reagan's attention. Amie was brought to Washington to hang her cherished Santa on the tree in the East Room.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. is familiar to most people only when it moves in to pick up the pieces after a bank failure. In Midland, Tex., which has been ravaged by bank failures, 20 FDIC liquidators in town on their grim business joined a local volunteer program called "Christmas in April." The FDIC people renovated 71-year-old Willie Ecole's home, installing new floors in the kitchen and bathroom and painting the interior.

Rep. Mike Synar (D-Okla.) quietly leaned on 22 Oklahoma corporate donors to wangle $200,000 in cash and pledges for the Special Olympics for handicapped children. Synar's personal appeal, made without any fanfare, went to such outfits as Southwestern Bell, Oklahoma Gas & Electric and the Oklahoma Bankers Association.

Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.), heir to the family pickle and ketchup business, was busy electioneering for the leadership of the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee recently when a message came from Pittsburgh that made him drop everything and head home. The occasion was the 100th birthday of Anna Kettler. For nearly 50 years, she was the Heinz plant's sole custodian of the secret blend of spices that go into its ketchup.

Rep. George W. Crockett Jr. (D-Mich.) alerted the State Department to the plight of a U.S. businessman who had a stroke while traveling in Taiwan. Thanks to Crockett's influence, the man was transferred to a better hospital and embassy people escorted the man's wife to his bedside.●

TRIBUTE TO DWIGHT BYRD

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, shortly after the 98th Congress recessed, the Washington Post reported the untimely death of a very talented, successful, young businessman, Mr. Dwight Byrd. Mr. Byrd was a highly acclaimed member of the fashion industry whose fashion shows were hailed as the greatest in the country. Dwight Byrd was well known to many Members of this body, for his work with the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation as the producer of the CBCF annual fashion show. Mr. Byrd was a warm and dedicated young man who achieved great things in a few years; he will be remembered and he will be missed for many years to come.

DWIGHT BYRD, FASHION SHOW PRODUCER, DIES

(By Nina Hyde)

Dwight Byrd, whose extravagant fashion show productions for the Congressional Black Caucus in Washington made tickets for those shows the most coveted for any fashion event here, died in Dallas Nov. 9 of acute kidney failure. He was 33.

"A fashion show should be entertainment . . . it should help you keep your mind off other things, like the economy. And it should make people enthusiastic about the clothes and want to buy them," Mr. Byrd said before the caucus show a year ago. His ability to gracefully incorporate all those elements distinguished his productions.

"He was an artist and a genius, and made each show innovative and exciting," said Roscoe Dellums, an attorney and the wife of Rep. Ron Dellums (D-Calif.), who helped launch the first Black Caucus show when it was proposed five years ago by Washington model Helen Moody. "He put our fashion shows on the map."

Mr. Byrd, who was born in Wilmington, Del., created fashion shows in his house as a small boy, twisting the gooseneck lamp to shine on his mother, a former model. He gave up an athletic scholarship at La Salle College to attend the Fashion Institute of Technology and got an advanced degree from the Pratt Institute.

He staged industry shows and designer fashion shows for Bob Mackie, Jeffrey Banks and others across the country. The show he produced in Dallas to celebrate the 20th anniversary of Mary Kay Cosmetics, attended by 8,000 at each of three viewings, may well have been the largest audience for any fashion show in history.

And what shows they were. For the Black Caucus show last year Mr. Byrd brought in a cougar to walk with the models in fur coats. (The cougar, frightened by the lights and the crowd, balked and refused to go down the runway.) To show off red, glittering evening dresses he created a five-alarm fire with red lights and dressed other models in D.C. Fire Department garb. By remote control, he directed an air-filled dirigible around the hotel ballroom during one show, and released 10 dozen mechanical birds from the stage as the grand finale for another.

Mr. Byrd, who recently moved to Dallas from New York, had a strong tie to Washington, mixing in Washington designers and models with those brought from New York, and lecturing at Howard University on each visit here.●

NATIONAL USURY ACT

HON. HENRY B. GONZALEZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, last week I reintroduced legislation (H.R. 591) to limit the allowable interest rate which may be charged annually on loans exceeding $300 to 10 percent. I feel compelled to address the subject of usurious interest rates because I consider it to be the most critical and crucial issues facing the American people and for which they have suffered and will continue to suffer, endangering the entire economic structure and well being of the traditional American standard of living.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Housing, I have repeatedly called the attention of my colleagues to the fact that there is such an intimate relationship between the soft underbelly of our economy and such things as home construction and business ventures. The highest rate of business closing and bankruptcies has been recorded in just the last year, outpeaking the highest number of bankruptcies declared during the Great Depression. Usurious interest rates threaten not only the so-called interest-sensitive sections of the economy, but all of it, and all of us.

The fact that is inescapable is that usurious interest rates cannot continue without irreparable, irreversible damage to the economy and to the standard of living of America. At no time in the history of mankind has any society been able to survive in a viable way economically, socially, or otherwise with usurious and unconsionable rates of interest.

In the type of society and economy that we have structured, particularly since World War II, based on mass production, mass credit, and mass consumption, high interest rates are not only corrosive, they are destructive. Mass credit developed on this economy of mass production based on mass consumption, but this credit was predicated on very low and reasonable interest rates—not very high unconscionable interest rates, what we have today.

Interest rates are a mechanism by which the wealth of a society is transferred. There is no other way of describing it, even though to hear the apologists for high interest rates you would think otherwise. But the truth is that interest rates are the mechanism by which the wealth in a society is transferred from some individual and collectivities to other collectivities and individuals. At no time in known established human history, no matter what form of governemt, no matter what form of society and going all the way back to extant human history, the days of the kingdom of Hammurabi to the days even of Jesus Christ, there have been wise and strong laws against usury, absolute vitally strong laws, sometimes punishable by death.

I have had citizen after citizen say to me—citizens ranging all the way from those I met in the adjoining State of Virginia, in my hometown in the State of Texas, and in the 17 States in which I have taken the subcommittee in the last 3 years—"Hey, Congressman, we always thought there was a law against usury."

How can we take for granted now over 14½ percent on long term, fixed 30-year mortgage interest rates? There is no way the average American family can afford to purchase a home this way. We have had hearings on adjustable rate mortgages [ARM's], and the graduated payment mortgages concocted right before the adjustable rates. We are in the midst of an extremely high rate of mortgage foreclosures, exceeding the highest point of the depression, and I introduced last year and have reintroduced this year the Home Mortgage Assistance Act to help alleviate the financial ruin faced by so many families who are facing the threat of home foreclosure.

These high interest rates have reached such a flagrant state of injustice that even the European industrialized nations have protested in vain to our leaders to do something about them. In the meanwhile, the idea here in the United States is rampant that interest rates will come down on their own and, besides, there is nothing you can do about high interest rates—that they are like an act of God.

There is no one in business that I know who can afford to go out at more than 18 percent and borrow even $3,000 to improve the inventory of a small business. I do not know of anyone who can do that for long, much less over a period of years. And yet this is exactly what is flagellating our country. And do you mean to tell me that nothing can be done about it? Prior Congresses have. Prior Presidents have. But one thing that they did not do was to let these forces take over the economic, fiscal, and monetary destiny of a country. This has been the issue since the beginning of our Nation when we had the First Continental Congress, the First and the Second. That was the issue, the creation of the North American Bank and the chartering of it, and what interest would be allowable for the bankers to charge.

Thomas Jefferson fulminated in language that was a lot stronger than any that is being used today in the modern world against those interests. He knew that those interests through time immemorial and up to today have only a single loyalty, and that is certainly not to the greatest interest of the greatest number of the country. Yet, that is what is in control today. For the first time we have allowed those interests to take over the economic, fiscal, and monetary destinies of this country, without being accountable to the America people, because the Federal Reserve Board in turn is not accountable the way it is operating now and the way the Congresses have let it operate.

The Federal Reserve was created by Congress to be an independent Federal agency, yet it has become so independent that it is now wholly unaccountable to the Congress, to the President, and certainly unaccountable to the American people. Consequently, the Federal Reserve has been so injudicious as to be controlled by the seven largest banks in the country who have gone out and loaned more than their total assets, their capitalization structure, to countries that cannot even pay the interest on their loans. And the American people, through their tax dollars paid into the International Monetary Fund, are having to bail out these banks at interest rates that in the meanwhile are strangling enterprise.

So now we have usurious interest rates, that by any prior definition would be considered illegal and, therefore, culpable under the statutes of our Nation. I have spoken out on this at a time when there was absolutely nobody predicting such interest rates would exceed even 10 percent. It was unthought of just 15 years ago—in fact, just 12 years ago. Some of us were speaking out because it was obvious—you do not have to be an expert; you do not have to be a banker; you do not have to be a big financial expert or economist of high regard to know that if the mechanism of interest rates, by which the wealth of a nation is transferred, is not controlled in the public interest by the people, then business cannot flourish and individuals cannot prosper.●

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE VANDEPOL FAMILY

HON. BILL SCHUETTE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer my congratulations to the VandePol family for being named the "Missaukee Soil Conservation District's Farmers of the Year." Herman and Shirley VandePol, along with their son Dale and his wife Holly, run a dairy farm of nearly 100 milking cows and cultivate 310 acres. They are in the third year of a 5-year agreement with the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service.

The VandePols use a variety of soil conservation techniques on their award-winning farm, such as leaving stover on their acreage during the winter and light tilling in the spring to keep approximately half of their crop residues on the surface. My colleagues from farming areas will appreciate that these procedures protect the soil from water and wind erosion, and the VandePols are so successful that their calculated soil losses are only 0.5 ton per acre per year.

The hard work of the VandePols and other farming families who participate in their local conservation district projects should not be taken for granted. I commend the VandePols and the fine staff of the Missaukee conservative district for their hard work in protecting what may be our most vital resource, good farm land.●

COLBY'S COTTER OFFERS PROPOSALS ON SOUTH AFRICA

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, recently, at the request of the Boston Globe, William R. Cotter, the distinguished president of Colby College, wrote an insightful and concise article on the situation in South Africa.

In this article, President Cotter presents some thoughtful alternatives to the present policy of the United States in dealing with the South African Government. His conclusions are ones Congress would do well to remember when it debates this important issue. I therefore submit the article for reprinting and commend it to my colleagues.

The article follows:

[From the Boston Globe, Jan. 21, 1985]

PUSHING SOUTH AFRICA ONTO THE PATH TO DEMOCRACY

(William R. Cotter)

WATERVILLE, MAINE.—No one should underestimate the importance of the increased militancy against South Africa's apartheid policies during the past two months in that country, as well as in the United States.

Because of these events, and because the Reagan Administration seems prepared to take initiatives in foreign policy, the time is ripe to use America's vast influence with this ally to help it reach a permanent accommodation with the three-quarters of its citizens who are now denied the right to vote. I believe there is a realistic prospect, within the next four years, for the beginning of true power sharing between blacks and whites which could lead, in a further few years, to majority rule with substantial and enforceable protection for minority rights.

If the Reagan Administration is willing to seize this chance, it can help achieve evolutionary, peaceful change to a truly democratic South Africa still aligned with the West. If it, however, persists in its unsuccessful policy of "constructive engagement," we are likely to witness increased polarization, escalating racial hatred, higher levels of domestic violence and greater intervention by the Soviet Union and its allies.

TWO IMPORTANT MONTHS

When the history of change in South Africa is written, the months of November and December 1984 may well rank as among the most important turning points in the troubled history of that country. Consider the following:

Nov. 5 and 6—A two-day general strike by 500,000 black workers in the Johannesburg-Pretoria region virtually paralyzed the industrial heartland.

Nov. 9—Chris Diamini, black president of the 150,000-member Federation of South African Trade Unions, was detained, along with other labor union leaders.

Nov. 13—Desmond Tutu, who had won the Nobel Peace Prize in October, was named the first black Anglican Bishop of Johannesburg.

Nov. 19—The three white business federations in South Africa, representing both English speakers and Afrikaners, in an unprecedented show of solidarity with black trade unions, condemned the preventive detention of Chris Diamini and other union leaders and civil rights activists. (He was later released.)

That same day, the white opposition party in the Parliament confirmed its decision to defy the government's ban on multiracial political parties and agreed to open its membership to all races.

CHANGES IN US

The United States witnessed equally dramatic changes at the end of 1984.

Nov. 8—Rev. Leon Sullivan announced that the "Sullivan Principles," which have been voluntarily adopted by 125 US companies operating in South Africa to govern their treatment of black employees, have been expanded; they now ask all US companies "to support the freedom of mobility of black workers to seek employment opportunities wherever they exist."

If US companies were to implement this latest principle, it would directly undercut the key apartheid policy of influx control. The South African government tries to restrict the number of blacks in urban South Africa while relocating the great bulk of the black population to desolate "homelands" in rural areas.

Dec. 5—Thirty-five conservative congressmen denounced South African racism and asked for stronger US policies.

Dec. 5—Peaceful picketing and sit-in demonstrations against South Africa's embassy and consulates grew to the point where six congressmen, the secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO, and other political and civil rights leaders were arrested.

Dec. 10—President Reagan, who during his first term was reluctant to criticize South Africa, called on it "to reach out to its black majority by ending the forced removal of blacks from their communities and the detention without trial and lengthy imprisonment of black leaders."

Dec. 18—The presidents of 16 leading American colleges and universities wrote to the American Chamber of Commerce in South Africa asking the chamber and its members to use their influence to end the influx-control system.

The remarkable thing about these events is that there is a growing consensus among blacks and whites in South Africa, and among conservatives and liberals, businessmen and university presidents in the US, that the South African government must make two fundamental changes in its policies:

Repeal the influx-control laws and allow blacks to seek work anywhere they want in South Africa.

End the odious detention without trial procedure under which, in 1984 alone, more than 1000 South Africans—nearly all black—were arrested without any charge and were kept incommunicado from families and lawyers under a law that allows them to be kept in solitary confinement indefinitely.

President Reagan has already endorsed these two fundamental changes. The question is whether the Administration is prepared to pursue those policy goals or will rest content with their simple enunciation. The "quiet diplomacy" of the first term has not produced fundamental changes in South Africa.

It is time for the United States to support moderate South African forces and to make it clear that we expect action by the government if it expects to continue to enjoy our support in the world arena. The US business community has already done a great deal of good within South Africa under the Sullivan Principles, but its influence is limited and indirect. It is time for the Administration to take the lead if it is truly interested in peaceful change.

STEPS THE US SHOULD TAKE

What can the US government do?

First, the President should choose an appropriate forum for a major speech devoted solely to South Africa. He should reiterate his call for the end of forced removals of blacks and to detention without trial, and he should make clear that under no circumstances is the United States prepared to recognize, as independent countries, the so-called homelands. Without dictating an American blueprint for a new constitution, he should call for a national convention of black and white leaders to be held by the end of 1987.

This convention would begin dialogue about ways to move to some new system of power-sharing, which would undoubtedly need to include a "Bill of Rights" to protect the personal liberty and property of minority groups.

President Reagan should promise that if the South African government ends influx control, stops preventive detention, and begins genuine dialogue with black leaders, the United States will increase its economic, diplomatic and other ties with South Africa and that we will take the leadership in the United Nations to end the military boycott.

At the same time, the President should make clear that in the absence of such progress, the United States is prepared to act. The President should indicate to the South African government that if it fails to move toward peaceful change, the United States would take one or more of the following four steps:

Prohibit any further American investment in South Africa or US bank loans to the South African government.

End all nuclear, intelligence and military cooperation with the South African government (each of which has increased during the past four years).

Work with other countries (an idea already under consideration by the Scandinavian governments) to end air service to and from South Africa.

Work with others to expel South Africa from the international telephone, telegraph and postal systems.

None of these steps would go so far as to withdraw current American investment or to end all trade with South Africa. However, even the threat to embark on this path would likely encourage those whites and blacks in South Africa who are working toward the goals of political participation for all races and the end of influx control and detention without trial, and would bring about some long-run hope for peace, equity and stability in that tormented country.

It would also make it clear to the South African government that continuation of its policies runs the great risk of increased isolation from the Western world, whose support and respect it so highly values.●

1985 CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL FOR SOVIET JEWS

HON. LAWRENCE COUGHLIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the 1985 Congressional Call to Conscience Vigil for Soviet Jews.

Unfortunately, those of us who have been involved over the years in efforts to ease the plight of Soviet Jews seeking freedom of religion or the right to emigrate know all too well that the situation for these people has become seriously worse in recent years. According to the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews, there are under 60 synagogues in the Soviet Union for that nation's 2½ million Jews. The teaching of Hebrew, Judaica, or any religious text is strictly prohibited and the printing of Hebrew Bibles or prayer books is unauthorized. The number of Jews emigrating from the Soviet Union continues its steady decline, from 51,000 in 1979 to a pitiful 896 in 1984. In addition, harassment of those who have requested permission to emigrate or who have attempted to study their religious heritage—either by teaching Hebrew or by holding prayer meetings or religious seminars—continues unabated. The recent arrest of Yuli Edelshtein, a prominent Moscow Hebrew teacher is but one example.

On September 4, Yuli Edelshtein's home—along with that of two other Moscow Hebrew teachers—was searched by KGB officials. Religious items, such as Bibles and Hebrew books, were confiscated. At the same time, however, KGB agents alledged that narcotics were found. Yuli was sentenced on December 19 to 3 years in prison camp for illegal drug trafficking, the maximum sentence under article 224 of the Soviet criminal code.

Prior to the sentencing, I placed a phone call to the Soviet judge handling the case to make a plea on Yuli's behalf. Any discussion of the matter was flatly refused. Yet, despite the official sentence, it is clear enough that Yuli Edelshtein's real crimes were applying for permission to emigrate and teaching Hebrew. In the face of an intensified and vigorous anti-Semitic propaganda campaign by the Soviet Government, and under the ever-present threat of KGB searches and seizures, arrest or exile, many Soviet Jews, like Yuli, have refused to renounce their religious and cultural heritage.

Like many others, I remain convinced that world opinion—that constant vigilance and pressure on the Soviet Government—can make a difference. In this vein, I am pleased to report—as the outgoing vigil chairman—that public and Congressional concern and commitment on the issue is as strong as ever. Last year, nearly 150 Members of this House participated in the Congressional Call to Conscience Vigil, and on behalf of more than 100 individuals or families in the Soviet Union.

It is in this spirit that I would like to extend my very best wishes to our colleague, Congressman SANDER LEVIN, who is chairman of the 1985 vigil. I sincerely urge each Member of this body to join SANDY in this important effort.●

CALIFORNIA FARMERS FACE DEEPENING CRISIS

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, lately the deep financial crisis facing farmers in the Midwest has gained national attention. But California, the most productive agricultural State in the Nation, has also been hit extremely hard by the depressed farm economy and huge farm debt. The president of the Federal Land Bank Association of Fresno, CA, quoted in the Wall Street Journal, summed it up this way:

> Not since the Great Depression has there been such a crisis in California agriculture. Right now, the banks are carrying the farmers. Next year, though, is going to be a nightmare.

California's grape and raisin industry is among the hardest hit. Warehouses in Fresno County are overflowing with a year's supply of raisins, about 150,000 tons. This surplus is expected to double soon, and about 30 percent of central California's 9,000 grape growers are expected to go out of business by the summer. Recently, an article written by Roxane Arnold appeared in the Los Angeles Times which examined the crisis facing the central California farming industry. I have reprinted Ms. Arnold's article here in recognition of the national importance of this problem:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Dec. 23, 1984]

A BATTLE TO KEEP THEIR LAND: STATE FARMERS HARVEST BITTER FINANCIAL WOES

(By Roxane Arnold)

MADERA, CA.—Her eyes blurring with tears, a blue-jeaned Sherrie Clark ambled around her sprawling ranch house, pausing now and then to point out a family treasure—the rough-hewn wooden birdhouse built by her 12-year-old son, a gallery of personal photographs, the bushes she had planted out front last spring.

Built four years ago on the crest of the 40-acre vineyard owned by Clark and her husband, Jerry, the house was designed "just the way we wanted," she said haltingly. "We figured we'd be staying here. We used to argue about which of the kids we'd leave it to when the time was ready. I guess we would have divided it among all four."

But the Clarks, like scores of others farming the bountiful fields of the San Joaquin Valley, will have little to say about who inherits their farm. Virtually penniless and unable to pay their mounting debts after three bad farming years, the couple was notified last week that time had run out for them. The bank is taking their home.

Until now, seemingly immune to the dizzying economic ups and downs experienced in other farming states, California is entering its worst agricultural crisis since the dispossessions of the Depression. Farmers such as the Clarks are contributing to a national farm debt that at $200 billion is more than the national debts of Brazil and Mexico combined.

The values of the rich farmlands in counties like Madera and Fresno have plummeted by as much as 70%, and prices for many of California's more than 200 crops have hit rock bottom. A growing number of farmers unable to convince banks and credit associations to loan them money enough to see them through another year, are walking off their land or being foreclosed on. Not surprisingly, the clusters of "for sale" signs along rural highways have drawn few takers.

"This is the worst I've ever seen it and I've been in this valley over 60 years," said George Schneider, co-owner of Pearson Realty in Fresno, the state's largest agricultural real estate firm. "We have the largest number of ranches for sale that I can remember . . . more than 100. We have properties that the Bank of America and others have taken over. That hasn't happened since the Depression."

In Fresno County, where 7,000 farmers produce a $2-billion bounty of crops each year—a seventh of California's total—the problems are expected to worsen with the new year. At least a third of the farmers are said to be in serious trouble and one in 10 stands to lose his land.

"NO USE LYING"

"It's no use lying," said Ken Billings, president of the Federal Land Bank Assn. in Fresno, a national farmer-owned lending agency that holds $4 billion in farm real estate loans in California. "We're not used to farmers in any number going out of business, not since the '30's. These are farmers of all sizes, big as well as small."

Hardly a crop has been without problems. Huge surpluses have driven prices down on everything from cotton and rice to wine and fruit. A strong U.S. dollar had driven up prices for overseas buyers at the same time foreign competition has eroded markets in this country.

Among the crops hardest hit have been Thompson seedless grapes, one of Fresno County's major commodities and a staple of the table grape, wine and raisin industries. With production from vineyards reaching all-time highs and an ailing California wine industry slashing its orders, more and more of the green grapes are being dried for raisins. Thousands of tons of unsold raisins are filling Fresno warehouses and packing plants.

LITTLE OR NO EQUITY

Raisin farmers, facing their annual after-harvest payments to banks and credit agencies either this month or next, are hurting. In two years, raisin prices have plunged from $1,200 a ton to about $500. While raisins cost as much as $1,300 an acre to produce, the cut-rate price translates to about $1,000 per acre. Land and interest payments further boost some farm debts by tens of thousands of dollars each year.

Meanwhile, vineyard land that sold for as much as $20,000 an acre in the late 1970s now goes begging for $4,000 to $6,000. Prospective buyers are sitting on the sidelines, waiting for prices to bottom out.

The plummeting land prices have left farmers with little or no equity to borrow against. Banks have taken to lending less and are calling in past-due debts.

Of the farmers scheduled to make their annual payments to the Federal Land Bank on Dec. 1, 16% did not pay. Land Bank president Billings expects the default rate to hit 20% on Jan. 1, when the bulk of real estate payments are due. At the federal government's Farm Home Administration office in Fresno, the traditional lender for the most debt-burdened farmers, the delinquency rate is 40%. Nationwide, 30% of the office's accounts are past due.

OFFICE-ESTABLISHED

Anticipating problems of its own, the Bank of America, California's largest private agricultural lender, last April set up a special office in Northern California to handle farms it was repossessing. By the end of October, the bank already had foreclosed on 27,000 acres of California farmland worth an estimated $21 million.

"We're expecting a rather substantial increase in the first part of 1985," said H.G. Weichart, vice president and manager of the new office. "Our numbers could more than double by July or August."

The most severely hurt farmers are those who rushed fastest to borrow when the price of farmland was highest three or four years ago. Now they are stuck with huge payments on land that has tumbled in value.

When the Clarks, both 42, decided to replace their two-bedroom "junker" with a new ranch house in 1981, they added to their Land Bank loan, bringing it to $205,000. The couple agreed to pay the bank a once-a-year payment of $32,000 in principal and interest. They would borrow the additional thousands of dollars needed to operate the vineyards from a credit association.

But less than a month after construction on the house began, their troubles started.

INCOME SUPPLEMENTED

Jerry Clark, a veteran California Highway Patrol officer whose "back was messed up when I got run over by a drunk one night," was pressed into early retirement. The CHP paycheck that supplemented his farm income was cut in half.

The next year, when heavy rains wiped out Clark's 75-ton crop of raisins, insurance covered only a part of his costs. By 1983, prices slid to $500 a ton and this year, Clark's crop, a meager 42 tons, earned him $371 a ton.

To augment his income, Clark has worked at a Clovis car dealership, and in recent months he's been on the lot from 8 a.m. until 10 p.m. most days. Despite the long hours, the commissions are "not enough to make a payment on 40 acres."

On Jan. 1 he will miss his land payment for a second year. He also owes $13,000 in past-due production debts. Attempts to sell the vineyard have been unsuccessful. Appraised two years ago at $600,000, the farm now is said to be worth $270,000.

"DON'T HAVE A NICKEL"

"I don't have anything left in savings and a minimal amount in checking," said the ruddy-faced Clark. For a long moment, he gazed out a bay window at his winter-brown vines. "I guess if I hadn't built the house I wouldn't owe as much," he said, linking his arms behind his head. "But when you don't have a nickel. . . ."

The couple's four children, who range from 5 to 12 years old, are having a difficult time accepting what has happened. Nor has it been easy on Clark's ailing mother, who lives with the family.

"The kids all say they're going to move in with somebody else," said Sherrie Clark in an emotion-choked voice. "They want to stay here. Every time somebody comes to see the house, the kids keep dirtying their rooms, hoping that will make a difference."

To try to make ends meet in the years since they built the house, the Clarks have done without curtains in their windows and have used donated furniture. Their one vacation in the last 11 years was a week at an Avila Beach motel. Even then, the vacationing family spent only $200, cooking all their meals in the room.

"I'd have been happy to keep one acre and the house," Clark said. "The future doesn't look too bright."

In neighboring Fresno County, raisin farmer George Masrobian finds himself "starting all over again" after 39 years of farming. Masrobian, 74, had planned on selling his 40 acres of prime farmland near Sanger to build a retirement home on the Fresno bluffs for himself and Ardy, his wife of 38 years.

Two years ago, the diminutive, balding Masrobian figured, "I'm not going to live another 10 years. Why should I kill myself? I decided to sell it. It didn't turn out very well."

After selling his vineyards to two brothers from Los Angeles for $20,000 an acre, Masrobian plunked the $217,000 down payment he received into construction of the new house. It would have ceramic floors, marble bathrooms, huge stained-glass windows.

To pay off the remaining debt, his buyers promised to pay Masrobian $2,000 a month beginning in July, 1982.

"They made no payments at all," he said. "It all went sour."

Although Masrobian said he "felt sorry" for the novice farmers, he launched foreclosure proceedings against them after eight months without a payment. He put his Fresno dream house on the market and reluctantly came out of retirement, borrowing more than $100,000 to get his vineyards back in operation.

"I'm old right now," said Masrobian. "I had set myself up not to do this anymore and here I am, starting all over again. What else could I do?"

Few in the industry have solutions that will help the likes of Clark and Masrobian. But while answers are scarce, the supposed culprits are plenty.

Some blame Federal Reserve Board anti-inflation policies, which they claim indirectly destroyed the only real asset of cash-poor farmers—their land equity. Others complain that the federal government's trade policies have failed to protect farmers from cheap foreign imports. Still others criticize banks and bank economists for their optimistic predictions that the good times would continue. Those same banks now are blamed for lending too much with too few restrictions.

"Inflation was very high at that time and the farmers, the growers were certainly not hesitant to demand credit or they'd walk down the street (to another lender)," countered Larry Layne, chairman of the Agricultural Lending Committee of the California Banker's Assn. "It's possible we could have been more restrictive, but we don't deserve all the blame."

VICTIMS OF OWN SUCCESS

To some extent, California farmers have been victims of their own success. In the rush to capitalize on the successes of the 1970s, they increased their almond orchards, expanded their cotton fields, extended their vineyards, creating the glut that plagues agricultural markets today.

Not accustomed to failure, the problems they face as a result seem even more devastating.

Even when their counterparts in other regions—from the wheat and soybean growers of the Midwest to the citrus growers of the South—suffered, California farmers were notorious for their Hawaiian vacations, expensive cars and expansive homes. Thanks to a climate suitable for a multitude of crops, the state's farmers could switch from one speciality to another, taking advantage of whatever crop was most profitable.

But with the cataclysmic changes of the past few years, that is no longer possible.

"Up until 1983, all we had to do was produce a crop and we'd have a profit. It was fun while it lasted," said Bob Hansen, who owns 500 acres of vineyards scattered over 30 miles of Fresno County. "That's $5 million worth of land I'm farming and now I'm losing about $50,000 a year minimum, maybe closer to $100,000. It's eating up what I have, and I have to live and the kids have to eat."

The gangling, 35-year-old Hansen said he is willing "to diversify to get out of this hole, but I don't know what to plant. The bank doesn't know."

Gerald Rebensdorf and his wife Cheryl have taken to working in the offices of the Fresno Raisin Co-Op to stave off disaster. A 10-acre chunk of his 180 acres of vineyards near Biola is up for sale but "I haven't had an offer yet," he admits.

"We're just like everybody else," said the 42-year-old farmer. "You'll go out and borrow the money, you build your house and you make your payments."

The payments on the family's brick-and-stucco ranch house with its beamed ceilings, swimming pool and solar-heating panels, plus the yearly debt on the vineyards, amounts to $130,000. This year, Rebensdorf figures he will run about $60,000 short.

"I could put it all up for sale," he said, "but anybody who would buy it is a fool."

In many ways more fortunate than others, Rebensdorf has a commitment from a lender for money to operate his vineyards this year. But his normal request for more than $300,000 was cut by a third.

"If this goes on another year, I'll be one of those who loses their places," he said.

Desperate to salvage what they can, raisin industry leaders launched an unprecedented national advertising campaign earlier this year to proclaim the lowest prices ever. The results were mixed.

Others, among them the president of a cooperative that includes Sun Maid raisin growers, are pushing for bolder moves.

"We're trying to sell raisins to Eastern Bloc countries," said Frank Light, president of Sun Diamond Growers. Light, speaking by telephone from airports in Houston and New York, was en route to Algeria.

"It's hard to find a ray of hope in this industry right now," he said. "But we're going to try. We're going to try and sell prunes, walnuts and raisins to Algeria and we are working with the Russians very closely right now. You can't just pile the raisins up and look at them."

Meanwhile, Sherrie Clark has begun scouting her neighborhood for a place to move the family. "We don't know what we're going to do," she said. "I've driven around, looked around. We just don't know about money."

Four months ago, Jerry Clark underwent surgery after suffering a heart attack.

"He doesn't talk about all this much," said his wife. "He hasn't really talked to the kids. And I know that's why he had his trouble, keeping it all inside.

"Me?" she continued. "I have sleepless nights, but I don't tell him. It feels like hell."

The problems facing central California's agricultural industry are typical of those facing farmers across the United States. This is not a local problem, but a national one that could deeply affect every person in the country. According to the Comptroller of the Currency's Office, a fifth of the Nation's farmers do not seem able to work out of the heavy debt they have had to incur to remain in production. This debt, combined with high interest rates, a strong dollar abroad, foreign competition, and record crops, has led to a dangerous situation that could spell doom for the traditional family farm.

As the 99th Congress begins to work on the 1985 farm bill, we must keep these important issues in mind. I am reminded of a quote from Daniel Webster, who, reflecting on the importance of agriculture to our country, stated:

Let us never forget that the cultivation of the earth is the most important labor of man. Unstable is the future of that country which has lost its taste for agriculture. If there is one lesson in history which is unmistakable, it is that national strength lies very near the soil.

There are no simple answers for the complex issues involved. But the Federal Government must strive to help alleviate this crisis before it ruins the vital agricultural base that this Nation is built upon.●

TRIBUTE TO HARRY ARROYO

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to pay tribute to a professional athlete from my home district who, this past month, again made his mark in the boxing world. I am speaking of International Boxing Federation lightweight champion Harry Arroyo of Boardman, OH.

Mr. Arroyo recently defended his title against a tough and determined opponent in what many boxing experts are calling the most exciting fights ever in the lightweight division. Harry was knocked down in the second round and was on the ropes for much of the early part of the fight. But Harry never gave up and he refused to cave in to the volley of punches being thrown at him. Later in the fight Harry connected with a devastating right and went on to score an impressive knockout.

I am extremely proud of the fact that Harry hails from my home district and that he has pledged his support for the massive community effort currently going on in the Mahoning Valley to attract General Motors' Saturn project. Harry Arroyo displays the type of "never say die" attitude and fighting spirit that is so emblematic of the people in my home district. Like Harry, the people of the Mahoning Valley have had to face great adversity and hard times. Yet, like Harry, they refuse to give up and they have fought back. The effort going on in the valley to attract the Saturn project and revitalize the area's economy is an indication that the people in my district are working together to change and better their future.

I am honored and so appreciative that Mr. Arroyo has agreed to serve on my task force to attract the Saturn project and develop ways to revitalize the Mahoning Valley's economy. I couldn't think of a better person to represent this effort than Harry Arroyo. I am confident that Mr. Arroyo will be an inspiration to the people involved in this effort and that the people in my district will follow his example and fight back to establish a sound future for the valley.

At this time I would also like to congratulate Mr. Arroyo for his recent victory and for his successful career. I wish him continued success in all his endeavors.●

TRIBUTE TO THE NEW FRONTIER DEMOCRATIC CLUB

HON. JULIAN C. DIXON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, on February 9, 1985, the New Frontier Democratic Club of Los Angeles, CA, will celebrate 25 years of distinguished service to the black community and the Democratic Party. Since its inception in 1960, the New Frontier Democratic Club has provided a fertile training ground and spirited forum for many dedicated public officials.

The idea and concept for the club was conceived by retired Superior Court Judge Sherman Smith, Sr., as he and his wife, Dr. Helen Smith, listened to John F. Kennedy accept the Democratic nomination for President of the United States in 1960. As Kennedy repeatedly referred to new frontiers and how "there will always be new frontiers to conquer," Judge Smith decided that "New Frontier" would be an excellent name for a Democratic club.

After discussing his idea with actor, teacher, and community activist, Milton Wood and his wife, Jacqueline, all agreed that there was a need for a Democratic club in the black community whose purpose would be to help elect qualified deserving Democrats to public office; have a voice in civic and political affairs; and have fun doing it.

Thus formed, the New Frontier Democratic Club quickly grew to a founding membership of 18 and gave essential support to the victorious 1960 campaigns of John Kennedy, President; AUGUSTUS HAWKINS, Member of Congress; and MERVYN DYMALLY, California State Assembly. In addition to the Smiths and Woods, founding members included Faith and Timothy Armstrong, Mary Batiste, Connie and Paul Bullock, Nell Zest Carriere, Rev. Edgar Edwards, Evelyn Evans, Arthur and Gwen Green, Comdr. Dennis Nelson, George Parks, Myrtle Porter, and Verlon Proutt.

Judge Smith served as New Frontier's first president from 1960 to 1963, and under his dedicated leadership the club became an active and reliable manpower resource for the political campaigns of the candidates it supported. Judge Smith was succeeded by Milton Wood, who served as president from 1963 until his death in 1966. Under Milton's creative leadership, fundraising became an integral part of New Frontier activities. He realized that the club's political influence could be greatly expanded by providing financial as well as manpower resources to the candidates it endorsed. The most successful of the fundraising events he initiated, Las Vegas Nite, became the fundraising role model for many community organizations.

At the time of Milton's death, New Frontier had just participated in the annual meeting of the Democratic State Central Committee, and was deeply involved in the political campaigns of Ivonne Braithwaite-Burke and Charles Warren for the California Assembly, MERVYN DYMALLY for State senator, ED ROYBAL for Congress, and Gov. Pat Brown.

Following Milton's death, each of the succeeding presidents of New Frontier sought to continue the exemplary service both he and Judge Smith had given to an organization borne of thoughtful vision. Those presidents, all of whom were stalwart leaders, include Representative JULIAN C. DIXON, the late Virgil Morrow, Dr. Herbert Carter, Stanley Talbert, George Beaubian, Rita Carr, John Floyd, Judge Sherman Smith, Jr., Joy Atkinson, John Harris, Louis White, and, current president, John Frierson.

The New Frontier Democratic Club has grown from the 18 founding members in 1960 to an average annual membership of 150 today. While its numerical growth is impressive, New Frontier has never swerved from its basic objective to elect good candidates to office. Elected officials who can point to New Frontier as an essential body of support in their campaigns are too numerous to list, but the citizens of Los Angeles, State of California, and the United States of America have all benefited greatly from their service.

The date, the New Frontier Democratic Club is one of the most active Democratic clubs in southern California. Its members are represented at Democratic Party meetings serve on various candidate fundraising committees, consult with candidates on political strategy, serve on the staffs of elected officials, are members of State and local boards, and network with other community and political clubs and groups.

New Frontier has made tremendous strides in raising the level of awareness about political issues confronting the community through widespread participation in community organizations and Democratic politics. Since 1965, it has given recognition to outstanding citizens and organizations in the black community; it has given more than $15,000 in scholarships to black high school graduates interested in pursing careers in political science through the Milton Wood Scholarship Fund; and, among its past and present members, the organization boasts 24 of the Los Angeles area's most influential community leaders in the fields of politics, education, criminal justice, social service, and the judiciary.

When the New Frontier Democratic Club celebrates its 25th anniversary on February 9, it can be proud of its outstanding and rewarding record of service to the black community. I look forward to the next 25 years of tireless work and inspired goals; for, despite the years, our philosophy has remained the same: There will always be new frontiers to conquer.●

TRIBUTE TO LOU BROCK

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, the residents of St. Louis, and fans of the baseball Cardinals all over the Nation, are celebrating Lou Brock's election to the Baseball Hall of Fame. The former Cardinal outfielder has been a legend for many years. I salute Lou Brock for his latest outstanding achievement, and I am happy to share with my colleagues the following reports from the St. Louis Post Dispatch.

LOU! LOU! LOU!

He stole bases, oh, how he stole bases. And he stole the hearts of Cardinal fans everywhere. But there was no thievery involved in Lou Brock's latest achievement. He earned his selection in his first year of eligibility to the Baseball Hall of Fame.

Lou Brock was more than the preeminent base stealer in baseball. He is a member of the exclusive 3,000-hit club, an honor shared by only 14 others. He was the team catalyst who sparked the Cardinals to three National League championships during his tenure with the team. He was a leader, who helped not only the younger players on the team, but who also gave of his time and energy to the youth of St. Louis.

His comments at a press conference after the announcement indicate the depth of the man. "I realize," he said, "that every honor always brings with it challenges and responsibilities and that's how I view my selection to baseball's Hall of Fame." Mr. Brock has met the responsibilities of being in the public image with integrity and dignity. At times, it may have seemed that he was not accorded the recognition he deserved: when Steve Garvey was selected as most valuable player the year Lou Brock stole 118 bases or when Carl Yastrzemski seemed to get more attention for reaching the 3,000-hit mark. For the ultimate baseball honor, however, there was no question. Lou Brock had been a Hall of Famer for a long time. Now, it's official.

LOU BROCK JOINS HALL OF FAME

(By Rick Hummel)

In his first year of eligibility, former Cardinals outfielder Lou Brock was elected to baseball's Hall of Fame on Monday night, along with longtime relief pitcher Hoyt Wilhelm, who pitched for the Cardinals briefly in 1957.

Brock holds the record for base-stealing in a career—938. He also is one of only 15 players to have more than 3,000 hits, finishing with 3,023. He was the 15th player to be elected to the Hall of Fame on the first ballot.

He will be inducted into the Hall in August in Cooperstown, N.Y.

A player must get at least 75 percent of the ballots to get into the Hall of Fame. Brock got 79.7 percent of the tally, 315 votes from 10-year members of the Baseball Writers' Association of America. Wilhelm gained 83.7 percent of the votes, or 331.

Nellie Fox, a star second baseman with the Chicago White Sox, fell 2 votes short in his last year of eligibility from the regular baseball writers' membership. Although his percentage of the vote was 74.6 percent, Hall of Fame President Ed Stack said the percentage must be an even 75 or more. So Fox was denied and now must wait until the veterans committee can consider his case in three years.

The late Ken Boyer, a former Cardinals star, got 68 votes after being restored to the ballot and will be eligible for 15 more years. Boyer was dropped from consideration for one year because he had failed to gain 5 percent of the vote.

Players must wait five years after their last active season to be considered for the Hall.

Brock, a St. Louis resident, is president of Broc-World, a merchandising and marketing firm that handles sports equipment and paraphernalia.

Brock was a .251-hitting outfielder, but one with promise, when Cardinals General Manager Bing Devine acquired him from the Chicago Cubs in June 1964. The deal was highly unpopular, because the Cardinals sent to the Cubs right-hander Ernie Broglio, who won 21 games in 1960 and who was 18-8 in 1963. Tales of Brock's outfielding play with the Cubs were spiced with phrases such as "Brock as in rock."

But Brock hit .348 in the second half of the 1964 season, sparking the Cardinals to their first National League pennant since 1946. Then in the World Series, he batted .300 as the Cardinals beat the New York Yankees in seven games.

Many years later, Brock, talking about the controversial trade, smiled and said, "I didn't care what people thought. I was a major leaguer."

Brock would hit better than .300 seven times with the Cardinals before he retired after the 1979 season. His best years were 1967—when he hit 21 homers, scored 113 runs and batted .299 for another world championship edition of the Cardinals—and 1974, when he stole a then-record 118 bases and batted .306.

His final season brought two milestones: his 3,000th hit—off Chicago's Dennis Lamp—and his 938th stolen base, which eclipsed the mark of 937 of old-timer "Sliding Billy" Hamilton. Two years earlier, Brock broke the accepted stolen-base record of 892 set by Ty Cobb.

Brock's final season seemed to be emblematic of the fire that burned within him, a seemingly placid person. The year before, riding the bench periodically under Manager Vern Rapp, Brock slumped to a career-low .221, and there were whispers that he might be finished.

But Brock, vowing to "orchestrate my own exodus," hit better than .300 for almost all of his last season with the Cardinals. "I refused to let anybody deny me my final moment of glory," said Brock at that time. "There came a time when everything I had done could have been tarnished. I refused to be denied."

Wilhelm pitched 21 years and a record 1,070 games in the major leagues while playing with the New York Giants, Cleveland, Baltimore, Chicago White Sox, California, Atlanta, Chicago Cubs and Los Angeles Dodgers.

The knuckleballing Wilhelm failed to get into the Hall of Fame last year by just 13 votes. He had a lifetime 143–122 won-lost record and a 2.52 earned-run average in his career. He pitched 14 seasons in which his ERA was lower than 3.00 and six seasons in which it was lower than 2.00.

In the rest of the voting, former Chicago Cubs outfielder Billy Williams was fourth with 252 votes, and pitcher Jim Bunning had 214. Catfish Hunter had 212, and Roger Maris had 128 votes. Maris played on two pennant winners with the Cardinals, besides hitting a single-season record 61 homers with the New York Yankees.●

STUDENT AWARENESS WEEK

HON. THOMAS J. RIDGE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of my colleagues, I would like to point out that the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania has declared the week of February 3, 1985, as "Student Awareness Week." On this occasion, there are a number of educators and concerned parents in my hometown of Erie, PA, whom I believe deserve recognition for the efforts to challenge the gifted students in our city. Thomas C. O'Rourke, superintendent of schools, Brenda A. Pundt, president of the school board, Chester P. Chrzanowski, supervisor of special education, and Robert Sullivan, one of the many parents actively involved in the gifted program in Erie, all deserve commendation.

For 8 years now, the Harding Gifted Center has provided opportunity for young minds to grow. This program for the gifted is a fine example of teachers, the school administration, and concerned parents working with Federal Government assistance. It is a fine example of parochial and public schools working together. And of course, we must recognize the talented students who attend the Harding Gifted Center. These are students who love to learn and inspire that love in other students as well. They contract with their regular classroom teachers to complete all their assignments while taking on an extra day of work each week at the center. There, they work on individual, advanced projects under the supervision of five teachers. The curriculum provides acceleration and enrichment, and a tremendous sense of accomplishment. The success of the program speaks for itself. Most of the students choose to remain in the program for years.

Some years ago, a study was done in Vermont that showed that one-third of those who dropped out of high school were gifted young people. If the statistics in Vermont are any indication of what is happening in the rest of the country, then certainly we are not developing the potential of our young people to the fullest extent. Aside from all the controversies over national and local education policies, I do not think anyone would dispute that our young people are the Nation's most precious commodity and indeed the Nation's future.

One of the important tenets upon which our Nation was founded was the idea of opportunity for all. When you apply this concept to the classroom, it means that all students should have the opportunity to be challenged in their schoolwork. We all know that children learn at different rates. Perhaps teachers are the only people who can fully appreciate the practical difficulties this presents as they try to challenge every child in their classrooms. It is my hope that the Harding Gifted Center will continue with its programs to help ensure that all students are given the opportunities they deserve.

Following a period of national questioning and soul searching about the quality and the effectiveness of our schools, it seems that many educators and parents have advocated a return to the basics of education. Perhaps the Harding Gifted Center's success may be attributed to that commitment to basics—excellent, dedicated teachers, concerned parents, an effective school administration, and something that we never really lacked—bright and motivated students.

As the Government continues to evaluate its role in education, I believe that it retains its current commitment, particularly in the areas of gifted education, handicapped education, and vocational education. As we continue our work to fulfill the needs of all of our citizens, we will need to increase our efforts in adult continuing education and industrial retraining. There are many decisions before us in the years ahead and it is our young people, like those attending the Harding Gifted Center right now, who will be able to help us to see our way into the future.●

THE INDICTMENT OF CHURCH SANCTUARY WORKERS

HON. CHESTER G. ATKINS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I like many of my colleagues are distressed at the recent indictment of church sanctuary workers in Arizona. I draw to the attention of my colleagues a well-considered statement of Bishops James R. Crumley, Lutheran Church in America; David W. Preus, American Lutheran Church; and William L. Herzfeld, Association of Evangelical Lutheran Church.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT ON THE INDICTMENT OF CHURCH SANCTUARY WORKERS

We are deeply disturbed at the news of a 71-count indictment, issued on January 14 against 16 people involved in the church sanctuary movement. It is particularly alarming that the indictment came as a result of a 10-month long investigation which included the infiltration of several churches, among them Southside Presbyterian in Tucson and Alzona Lutheran in Phoenix, by federal informers and undercover agents.

The reasons which cause some congregations to go through the painful and searching process of declaring themselves sanctuaries for refugees from Central America are many and compelling, but all are motivated by a deep faith and a fundamental humanitarian concern for the safety of these refugees in our midst.

We share the concern of these congregations for the protection of Central American refugees and we firmly believe that conditions in Central America today do not permit the safe return of those who have fled civil strife at home. We were recently reminded of the pervasive violence and terror in war-ravaged El Salvador when the Reverend David Fernandez, a Lutheran pastor in San Miguel, was found brutally murdered near his home, one of some 50,000 unarmed civilians who have been killed in El Salvador since 1980.

Because of our belief that refugees from the turmoil in Central America must be granted safe haven, we have strongly supported, and continue to support, the enactment of legislation to temporarily suspend the deportation of Salvadorans from the United States while the conditions which caused them to flee persist. Passage of this bill, sponsored by Rep. Moakley (D-MA) and Sen. DeConcini (D-AZ) must be a top priority of the 99th Congress. We will continue to encourage members of our churches to support such legislation.

We see in the Phoenix indictment the possible beginning of a confrontation between sanctuary churches, firm in their faith that theirs is a Biblical mandate, and the government in its questionable interpretation of the law. We encourage instead a renewed dialogue and ask that the government cease the prosecution of lay and ordained church workers and the monitoring of church activities as a means of response to this difficult moral and theological issue.●

HELEN MARION HAMMOND APPRECIATION DAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1985

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, February 3, 1985, the city of Berkeley, CA, will honor Helen Marion Hammond by declaring it as Helen Marion Hammond Appreciation Day. Helen Marion Hammond has been a distinguished citizen and community leader in Berkeley for over 40 years. She is both reasonable and fair in her selfless and tireless efforts on behalf of the community.

Ms. Hammond's activities in the political process have spanned decades. She was actively involved in Franklin D. Roosevelt's first Presidential campaign, Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, Jack Kent's city council campaign, the fight against the West Berkeley Industrial Park, my campaign for City Council of Berkeley, the April Coalition campaign, the anti-Vietnam War movement, the Berkeley Architectural Heritage Association, Berkeley Citizens Action [BCA], the campaigns of councilmembers Denton and Fukson, obtaining landmark status for Finnish Hall, neighborhood associations such as the Oceanview Committee, Fifth and Camellia Neighborhood Association, and Council of Neighborhood Organizations, Neighbors for Clean Air, and member of board of directors of the West Berkeley Senior Center.

Marion Hammond in her personal life successfully challenged bank policies of not granting home loans to single women. She was employed at Kaiser Shipyards during the early period of World War II and at that time was the only woman delegate to the Metal Trades Council. Marion Hammond was later married and raised two sons in Berkeley while continuing to be active in community affairs, the PTA, and helped found the Arts and Crafts Co-op.

In the early 1960's she re-entered the work force as a Licensed Vocational Nurse and helped organize and obtain contract for Local 250 S.E.I.U., and served that local in the capacity of shop steward and negotiator, while continuing to be active in community affairs.●

A TRIBUTE TO HEMLOCK HIGH SCHOOL BAND

HON. BILL SCHUETTE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Speaker, I wish today to pay tribute to the accomplishments of the Hemlock High School Band of Hemlock, MI. Traveling all the way from Michigan by bus for the inaugural festivities, the Hemlock Huskie Band is taking home first place in the "All American Festivals' Band Contest." Their success, and the pride they have brought the State of Michigan, can be attributed to their own discipline, the support of their parents, many of whom traveled with them, and the fine leadership of their friend and teacher, Mr. Carl A. Gippert.

Mr. Speaker, from my own experience I know that you are continually addressed by Members from all over this Nation, each of whom is praising the merits of his or her constituents, but the Huskie Band is without doubt one of the finest groups of young men and women I have ever met. They are taking home a first place prize to prove it, and I salute them.●

MASS TRANSIT UNDERFUNDED, MERITS MORE MONEY AND BETTER TREATMENT

HON. LAWRENCE COUGHLIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, a compelling case for more and dedicated funding, and better treatment for our Nation's mass transportation systems has been made in an editorial published by the Philadelphia Inquirer.

I am pleased to bring this pertinent comment to the attention of my colleagues and note with pride that the editorial was prompted by the appearance in the Philadelphia area of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, the Honorable JOHN HEINZ. At the car repair shops of the Southeastern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority [SEPTA], Senator HEINZ pledged to seek equitable funding for and to oppose efforts to target unfairly mass transit for excessive reductions to ease the Federal deficit.

As a ranking member of the Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee, I recognize the key role mass transit plays in the lives of our urban and suburban communities. Individual livelihoods and jobs as well as the overall economic health of urban areas depend—to a great degree—on the availability of adequate, reasonably priced and reliable mass transportation systems.

We may not be able to make up for decades of benign neglect that have eliminated or crippled many mass transit facilities, but we must accept the important place public transportation fills in millions of lives. Unfortunately, recent history shows that moves continue to shortchange mass transit or relegate it to a low priority. This is a shortsighted approach.

Less than 2 years ago, for example, the Congress raised the gasoline tax from 4 to 9 cents. As the Inquirer points out, 1 penny of the hike was dedicated to mass transit systems for capital expenditures. Yet, the Congress set transportation's share of the increase at $1.1 billion annually—some $400 million less than 1-cent dedication generated. I recall vividly that I—along with other Members—voted for the gasoline tax hike only when we were assured unequivocally that mass transit would be guaranteed revenues from the 1 penny dedication.

In addition, I have worked hard and with some success to assure that funds from the gasoline tax should go for capital expenditures and maintenance. It makes no sense—logically and economically—to allow the Federal Government the authority to fund capital equipment purchases such as rail cars and buses, and yet not permit it to expend moneys to maintain this multimillion dollar equipment. To obtain every penny's worth of value of gasoline tax moneys for the public, funds must be permitted for repairs and maintenance so that rolling stock bought by capital funds can attain full life expectancy.

I hope that the Congress will direct that dedicated funding be used for mass transit system maintenance. If not, it may take new legislation. I would hope, in that event, that a bruising battle could be avoided. Mass transit is essential, but it is underfunded. It merits better treatment because it is vital to national and individual economic well-being.

Submitted is the January 23, 1985 editorial in the Philadelphia Inquirer for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

CONGRESS AND MASS TRANSIT

Sen. John Heinz (R., Pa.), at a news conference at SEPTA car repair shops in Upper Darby last week, made a welcome commitment to seek equitable federal funding for mass transit in the Congress this year. The senator promised to oppose moves that would single out transit unfairly as a handy target for excessive cuts as part of the deficit reduction process.

Seeking funds for transit in face of urgent needs to reduce federal spending and cut the deficit might seem unreasonable, but precisely the opposite is true. Transit has been short-changed through fiscal sleight-of-hand—injustices that need to be corrected.

When the Congress boosted the federal gasoline tax from 4 to 9 cents a gallon effective in 1983, 1 cent of the increase was dedicated to mass transit systems for capital expenditures. However, when it came to providing the money, the Congress was too conservative. It set transit's share of the tax hike at $1.1 billion a year—about $400 million less than the 1-cent portion of the gasoline tax is generating annually. Thus, Congress has a duty to provide transit systems with full funding from the 1-cent part of the tax. Sen. Heinz plans to take the lead in the Senate in seeking the additional authorization and he should have bipartisan support.

Beyond that, transit should have received more than just a 1-cent allocation of the 5-cent increase—with the highway lobby gobbling up the other 4 cents. A more equitable distribution would have been 2 or 3 cents for transit. Congress well might change the allocation formula this year.

Another approach, maybe a better one, would be to increase the federal gasoline tax by several cents a gallon, with perhaps half of it going to transit. With gasoline prices going down, an increase in the gasoline tax would be almost unnoticeable at service station pumps—as close to painless as any tax increase can be. President Reagan, while apparently disinclined to ask for a tax increase, philosophically favors user fees and might approve a boost in the fee imposed on highway users, which is what the gasoline tax amounts to.

SEPTA and other transit authorities have made the valid point that federal funds from the gasoline tax should be usable for maintenance as well as capital expenditures. It makes no economic or business sense to the federal government to buy buses, rail cars and other rolling stock for transit systems and deny funding for repairs and overhauls needed to keep the equipment in good condition for full service life expectancy. Changing the law to allow a portion of gasoline funds to be used for maintenance purposes is another action that the Congress should take this year.

TRIBUTE TO EDWARD DEBARTOLO, JR.

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to pay tribute to someone from my home district who has made me and my constituents very proud. I am speaking of Mr. Edward DeBartolo, Jr., of Youngstown, OH, and owner of the 1985 Super Bowl Champion San Francisco Forty-Niners.

Edward DeBartolo, Jr., became owner of the Forty-Niners several years ago at a time when the team was in disarray and had the image of a loser. Edward had taken over a team that showed little promise. But despite these adverse conditions, Edward was determined to build a winner—he had a bold vision of a bright future. Through a lot of hard work, dedication, innovation, and persistence Edward realized his lofty goals. His Forty-Niners have won the Super Bowl 2 out of the last 4 seasons, and this year's decisive thrashing of the Miami Dolphins places the 1985 Super Bowl Champion Forty-Niners among the greatest teams in professional football history. That Edward succeeded in building a winning team and class organization is a testament to the man's fine character and strong will.

I am proud that Mr. DeBartolo is a Youngstown native and that he has pledged his support to the massive community effort in the Mahoning Valley to attract General Motors' new Saturn plant. Edward's bold determination and strong desire is deeply reflective of the people in my district. Those people have been faced with great adversity and hard times. Yet they have not given up and they are fighting back with a rare type of community spirit. Like Edward, they have a vision of a better tomorrow and they are all joining together to work to make that vision a reality.

I am deeply honored and so appreciative that Mr. DeBartolo has agreed to serve on my task force designed to attract the Saturn project and develop ways to revitalize the Mahoning Valley's economy. I am confident that with the leadership and guidance of people like Edward DeBartolo, Jr., the people in my district will be able to continue working together to solve their problems and realize their high aspirations. At this time I would also like to congratulate Mr. Debartolo for winning the Super Bowl for a second time and for his dedication and commitment to the Mahoning Valley community. I wish him continued success with the Forty-Niners and in all of his endeavors.●

U.S. ARMED FORCES SUPPLEMENTAL BENEFITS ACT OF 1985

HON. HENRY B. GONZALEZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, last week I reintroduced a bill—H.R. 590—to provide compensation for the victims of the disaster in Lebanon and the undeclared war in Grenada. This bill would also provide special compensation for those who might be killed in future hostilities in Central America or elsewhere. We owe something to the families of the service members who have died and may still die as a result of serving in the many dangerous frontiers into which they have been committed.

Specifically, my bill provides for the payment, tax free, of $50,000 to the survivors of any service member who died in Lebanon last year or, for that matter, in the line of duty in any other foreign country. The death need not have been the result of hostile action. For example, military definitions of the cause of death could not exclude benefits for the survivors of the two marines killed in Beirut in 1983 while trying to disarms a cluster bomb. That incident might not be deemed hostile action, but no fair standard could deny some kind of benefit to the survivors of those soldiers who would not have died but for hostile action. Likewise, the "line of duty" definition would provide compensation to the men killed by the suicide bombings in Lebanon, even though it was never determined that these were military assaults in the generally accepted meaning of the term. That is, while it may not be clear that the attacker belonged to anybody's army, it is sufficient that the men killed did die in the line of duty and would not have died but for the fact that they happened to be assigned to the peacekeeping force in Beirut. Similarly, the bill provide compensation to victims of friendly fire if such a tragedy should ever come to pass, or if a service member were killed by some other accident in the line of duty.

Furthermore, this bill provides special benefits for the families of those wounded in the course of service overseas. Families would be allowed the use of Government visitor facilities close to the hospitals where their loved ones were being treated. The families would also receive a reasonable per diem to help cover their expenses. A service member wounded in Lebanon or Central America, for example, is not likely to be hospitalized close to home. There is no reason why their families should suffer endless economic loss in order to be near their wounded sons. For example, no matter where a burn victim might reside, that individual is going to be treated at Brooke Army Medical Center in San Antonio. Likewise, all the casualties from Lebanon were sent to hospitals here on the east coast. It is a sensible and humane thing to facilitate the efforts of their families to be nearby.

I know that there are those who will say that there is no price that can be put on patriotism, and there are those who will say that death or injury is expected in military service, and so no special compensation or assistance is warranted for those killed and wounded in Lebanon or Grenada, or wherever Americans are being, or will be, exposed to hostile action. But let me remind you, the Federal Government today pays a special compensation of $50,000 to law enforcement officers who are killed in the line of duty. If we can do that for law enforcement officers, there is no excusing the lack of a similar benefit for the families of those who have died while protecting the interests of this country. Dying or being gravely injured in an undeclared war or while serving with some multinational peacekeeping force is not in any soldier's agreement to serve, and warrants special benefits.

The least that we can do for the victims of undeclared war, and the victims of foreign commitments, is to extend to them the same kind of gratitude and consideration that we today provide for domestic law enforcement officers or even Congressmen who die while in office. These young people have given this country service above and beyond any reasonable call of duty, and they deserve more than our commendations; they, and their families, deserve a fitting mark of our gratitude and respect, which this bill provides.●

THE DEFICIT REDUCTION ACT OF 1984

HON. BERYL ANTHONY, JR.

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, today, a number of my colleagues and I are introducing legislation regarding what I consider to be a serious oversight on Congress' part when we adopted the fringe benefit provisions in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984.

Under new section 132, many existing fringe benefits were codified. Several exclusions were put into the statute, including a working condition exclusion. Unfortunately, as interpreted by the IRS, public safety employee vehicles are not included in this exclusion. This will result in State troopers, sheriff's deputies and emergency medical personnel being taxed on a portion of the use of their vehicle. I consider a police officer to always be on duty, and I know in Arkansas that many law enforcement agencies encourage police officers to drive their official vehicles when off duty to heighten the presence of law enforcement in the community.

I am convinced it was not the intent of Congress to tax these men and women on the use of their patrol car or emergency vehicle. Therefore, I am introducing a bill that would provide that the use of certain law enforcement, fire protection, and emergency medical vehicles in certain cases would not be taxable as a fringe benefit.

Mr. Speaker, these people are always on duty—to serve the public. I hope my colleagues will review this measure carefully, and I would welcome their support.

To Amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide that the use of certain law enforcement, fire protection, and emergency medical vehicles in certain cases shall be treated as a nontaxable fringe benefit

SECTION 1. Use of Certain Public Vehicles Treated as Working Condition Fringe Benefit.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (h) of section 132 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to certain fringe benefits) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(6) Certain required uses of public law enforcement and emergency vehicles.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of subsection (a)(3), any qualified use of a qualified public vehicle by an eligible employee shall be treated as a working condition fringe.

"(b) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

"(i) QUALIFIED PUBLIC VEHICLE.—The term 'qualified public vehicle' means any specifically equipped vehicle which—

"(I) is operated by or for a governmental unit, and

"(II) is used by such governmental unit to provide law enforcement, fire protection, or emergency medical service or to provide such other service relating to the public safety as the Secretary may prescribe by regulations.

"(ii) ELIGIBLE EMPLOYEE.—The term 'eligible employee' means, with respect to any vehicle, any employee of a governmental unit—

"(I) Whose principal duties include the provision of the type of service described in clause (i)(II) for which such vehicle is used by the government unit, and

"(II) who regularly uses such vehicle in the course of his employment.

"(III) QUALIFIED USE.—The term 'qualified use' means, with respect to any vehicle, any use of such vehicle which is required by the governmental unit.

"(IV) GOVERNMENTAL UNIT.—The term 'governmental unit' means the United States, any State, any political subdivision of any State, and the District of Columbia.

EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect as if included in the amendment made by section 531(a) of the Tax Reform Act of 1984.●

TRIBUTE TO MR. HOWARD GAFFKE

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to honor Mr. Howard Gaffke of Cole County, MO, for his 39 years of continuous service in county government. Mr. Gaffke's dedication to his job represents the high quality of public service which the people of Cole County have had over the years. After 5 years of distinguished military service, Mr. Gaffke spent the first 10 years in local government as the Cole County treasurer. He was then appointed county assessor, a position he has held for the past 29 years. I wish Mr. Gaffke all the best for the future, and ask my colleagues in the House of Representatives to join me in congratulating him on his many fine years of community service.●

COMMENDATION OF ASIAN HERITAGE CELEBRATION

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Mr. EDWARDS and Mr. ZSCHAU, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize and commend the Asian heritage celebration to be held March 16-24 in Santa Clara County. The celebration will commemorate the contributions that bay area residents of Asian descent have made in the past and will educate the public about those contributions. We are pleased to bring this festival to the attention of the Congress and we express our pride in the accomplishments of Americans of Asian descent in Santa Clara County.

The week of celebration was first suggested by members of the Chinese Folk Dance Association as part of their 25th anniversary. It was conceived specifically to allow community groups to work together to disseminate knowledge about the culture and achievements of Americans of Asian descent. Such education and commemoration is important because Americans of Asian descent have provided a diversity of cultures, lifestyles and points of view that give color and variety to our entire community. They have supported the business and scientific communities since the early railroad-building and farming days, and today they provide great resources to Silicon Valley's high-technology industries.

The organizers of the celebration hope to dispel lingering myths and misunderstandings by educating the public about the cultures of Americans of Asian descent through cultural events. They hope to communicate and show the diversity of the Asian heritage. The celebration will begin with an Asian New Year Festival, with a parade and banquet taking place in San Jose. Also taking place during the week will be an Asian Filmmakers Festival, a series of cultural exhibits, an Asian Dance Festival, and Asian Designers '85, an Asian fashion show. Through events such as these, the festival will achieve its goal of providing opportunities for the expression of the culture of Americans of Asian descent.

We take pride in our community's cultural diversity and we recognize and commend this celebration. We feel that this event will reinforce traditional values and respect for the Asian heritage in Americans, while aiding the assimilation of diverse cultures into the greater American culture. We are proud to bring it to your attention.●

LABOR LAW VIOLATION DEBARMENT

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation today to deny Federal contracts to companies or labor groups when the Secretary of Labor certified that they have engaged in a pattern of willful violations of Federal labor law. This legislation—balanced and fair to all parties—is very important to American workers and will insure that the Federal Government does not reward chronic lawbreakers.

Mr. Speaker, 18 years ago, similar legislation was introduced. The report on that bill by the House Special Committee on Labor suggested that Federal contracts be denied to repeated violators of the National Labor Relations Act. Similar legislation was again introduced in the 94th Congress. In July of 1977, President Carter sent to Congress a package of reform measures which included this debarment provision. And, during the 95th Congress, the House passed the labor law reform bill which strengthened NLRB remedies against repeated violators of the Labor Relations Act. An amendment offered on the House floor to strike the debarment provisions failed, 301 to 111.

The rights, duties, and prohibitions set out in the National Labor Relations Act are not self-enforcing. If a company or a union fails to comply with a Board order, the Board can seek enforcement through the Federal courts. But legal rights have limited value if many years are required to enforce them. It is time for more effective remedies.

Debarment for repeated and willful violators will preserve the integrity of the Federal contracting process by withholding Federal contracts from companies or unions that willfully and systematically violate Federal court or NLRB orders. The United States should not be subsidizing those who repeatedly violate the law.

Debarment remedies are established as appropriate in the case of willful violation of other Federal statutes. Such provisions exist in the Davis-Bacon Act, Executive Order 11246 which deals with equal employment opportunities, and the Walsh-Healy Act, among others.

Under the bill, the Secretary of Labor may remove or reduce the contract restrictions imposed against a company or union, if there is no other source for the materials or services or if the national interest so requires. The debarment period is for a maximum of 3 years and can only occur after a pattern of willful violations and only affects the awarding of contracts after identification by the Secretary of Labor. In no instance may an existing contract be cancelled. All a company or union needs to do to avoid debarment is to obey the law.

There should be no financial incentive for those who break the law. The present procedures penalize law-abiding businesses and employees by not protecting them from the unfair competition of corporations not complying with the law.

The question is: Do we want our tax dollars spent on contracts with companies that break the law? The Office of Federal Contract compliance estimates that 40 percent of our labor force is employed by firms that do business with the Federal Government, either directly or indirectly. This bill only assures that Federal money will not be used to help break the Federal law.

Mr. Speaker, in past years, legislation similar to this has gained bipartisan support because it is fair, and it is balanced. The bill only asks that corporations doing business with the Federal Government obey the law. I urge quick action on this bill by the Committee on Education and Labor.●

A TRIBUTE TO MR. PHIL ERSHLER

HON. ROD CHANDLER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. CHANDLER. Today, on the floor of the House, I want to commend to the Nation Mr. Phil Ershler, a mountaineer in my district in Washington, who, on October 20, 1984, became the first American to successfully scale Mount Everest's 29,028-foot summit using the Great Couloir route. Phil was one of the 12-member China Everest 1984 Expedition that began on August 6. The team was led by another Northwest climber, Lou Whittaker, brother of Jim Whittaker, the first American to scale Everest 21 years ago.

The expedition members endured incredible hardships to make Ershler the first American to scale Everest via this route. Avalanches, winds up to 100 miles per hour, frozen eyes, bloodied throats, and dehydration forced the other climbers to turn back and cheer Phil on his last 1,000 feet alone.

Phil has been trying for the summit for the last 3 years. He climbs because he likes to climb mountains and not just because he wants to reach the summit. He feels the effort and experience are definitely worth it.

I admire the hardships the team endured to accomplish this outstanding feat and wish to acknowledge to the Nation Phil Ershler and the China Everest 1984 Expedition for their incredible endurance and skill and the national pride their feat instills in all of us.●

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I have reintroduced legislation, H.R. 734, to amend the Internal Revenue Code to exempt certain emergency transportation of individuals from the excise tax on transportation by air. Also, this bill calls for the exemption from excise tax on air transportation for helicopters not using or benefitting by federally assisted facilities

Presently, injured or ill persons that require air transportation to medical facilities are charged with an 8-percent excise tax on the cost of their flight. These flights are often not covered by insurance and must be paid for out of the individual's or family's personal income. This is a burden to people already facing a costly and emotionally difficult situation. The average air medical transport costs between $2,000 and $3,000. Eight percent of this cost can be substantial to individuals paying the tax. However, the amount of revenue gained by the Treasury is likely to be minimal due to the relatively few number of air medical transports.

To insure that this exemption is not abused by individuals using commercial airlines for travel to medical facilities, this bill states that the exemption applies only for transportation of an injured or ill person by an aircraft which—first, contains special equipment for purposes of transporting injured or ill persons, or; second, contains seats that may be modified to accommodate a stretcher, and; third, is used predominantly in the transportation of injured or ill persons. This narrow language will limit the exemption to air ambulance travel and prevent the involvement of ordinary passenger commercial airlines.

The remainder of this bill deals with some of the excise taxes on helicopter transportation as imposed by the Airport and Airway Improvement Act of 1982. When Congress passed the act, it believed there was a pressing need to improve our airport and airway systems. It chose to raise the revenue necessary to accomplish this by imposing user fees on fuel, persons and property. The helicopter service industry sought an exemption from these user fees so long as the vehicle did not take off from, or land at, a facility eligible for assistance under the Airport and Airway Development Act of 1970, and did not otherwise use services provided pursuant to the Airport and Airway System Improvement Act during such transportation. The exemption was only granted to the mining and timber industry.

Since the rationale for this exemption lies in the fact that the helicopters are not using or benefiting by facilities assisted by the 1970 and 1982 acts, it seems illogical that other helicopter operations fitting the same user criteria do not qualify for the exemption. This bill seeks to make this exemption logically consistent by exempting all helicopter operations from fuel, persons and property excise taxes so long as they do not use or benefit by facilities assisted by the 1970 and 1982 acts. User fees should be paid by users and nonusers should be exempt. This simple logic is what this bill hopes to accomplish.●

IN MEMORY OF CHARLES P. BUCHANAN

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commemorate the life of a distinguished member of the Harlem community, Charles P. Buchanan. He passed away recently at the age of 86.

During his lifetime, Charles Buchanan witnessed the growth of Harlem into a thriving mecca for artists, writers, and entrepreneurs. He was not only a participant in the Harlem renaissance, but actually helped to make it as great as it was. His contribution was a significant one.

He managed the famous Savoy Ballroom for 32 years, hosting the truly great jazz artists of his time. The ballroom, along with the Cotton Club and Apollo Theater, were the hubs of the Harlem renaissance, their memories enduring forever. Charles Buchanan and his peers enriched the lives of many, and contributed much to the development of 20th-century American culture. We are endebted to Mr. Buchanan for his priceless gift.

It is therefore appropriate, Mr. Speaker, that we pay tribute to this dedicated man. His memory will remain forever in our hearts.●

NATIONAL INVENTORS' DAY

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation designed to celebrate innovation and heighten public awareness to the vital contributions inventors make to our country's progress. This bill designates February 11, 1985, as "National Inventors' Day"—a date significant as the birthday of Thomas Edison, one of America's most prominent creators.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties and the Administration of Justice, which seeks to refine the patent process in the public interest and render more adequate protection to inventors, I feel this resolution is an important tool for recognizing creative individuals and will educate us all on the impact their discoveries have on our daily lives. To illustrate this impact, consider the six inventors who will be inducted into the Inventors Hall of Fame on February 10, 1985, and their contributions to society: Marvin Camras for magnetic recording; Willem Kolff for kidney dialysis machines; Roy Plunkett for Teflon; Louis M. Moyroud and Rene

A. Higonnet for photographic-type composition; and Willis Carrier for air-conditioners. Obviously, our lives would be dramatically different without these innovations.

A basic premise of a democratic society is the protection it affords to individual creation. Prior to the protections established by the patent system, inventors had no intrinsic right to profit from the ownership and marketing of their works. Patents were granted by special acts of legislation and left solely to the discretion of the various Colonies and States. By laws, no right existed. George Washington urged Representatives of the First Congress to give "effectual encouragement * * * to the exertion of skill and genius at home." Indeed, the Constitution gives Congress the power to "promote the progress of science and useful arts" by granting limited monopolies in the form of patents on inventions. Consequently, the financial returns and appreciation afforded to holders of patents have been the inventor's incentive for improving upon existing products and creating new ones.

I urge my colleagues to support "National Inventors' Day" and celebrate the genius from which all benefit—the mind of the inventor.●

THE DEFICIT REDUCTION ACT

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, my office has been deluged with protests from concerned senior citizens regarding the Medicare premium increase which was mandated by the Deficit Reduction Act in the 98th Congress. Ironically, that same act also calls for another action which, if repealed, could make the premium increase unnecessary. Today, I am introducing legislation to correct this situation.

The Deficit Reduction Act calls for the Federal excise tax on cigarettes to drop from 16 cents to 8 cents per pack as of October 1. That action will result in some $1.7 billion in lost revenue—revenue which could be earmarked for the Medicare hospital insurance trust fund. The bill I am introducing would continue the cigarette tax at its present 16 cent level, and would provide the Secretary of the Treasury with authority to transfer that revenue to meet the demands of Medicare hospital insurance benefit payments each month.

To my way of thinking, it is a sad paradox that last year's congressional action will impose an undue burden on older Americans while at the same time easing the disincentive for a hazardous habit. In 1980, $16 billion in health costs was directly attributable to cigarette smoking, while another $26 billion in indirect costs accrued as a result of loss of earnings from sickness or death. All Americans pay this high price through higher insurance premiums, higher prices for goods and services, and the cost of public assistance programs for smoking-induced illness.

I believe my bill is sound. It will assist Medicare without imposing new taxes, and may actually eliminate the need for unwanted premium increases.●

BALANCED BUDGET

HON. DAN MICA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a package of bills to require a balanced budget. There is no doubt among most Americans today that we must balance the U.S. budget and rid ourselves of the staggering deficit that threatens our economy.

While I do this, I want to make it clear that I do not support any budget cuts in Social Security. I believe that the passage of the Social Security Amendments of 1983 has improved the financial solvency of the Social Security trust funds and helped to secure the financial future for millions who are entitled to the fulfillment of our promise to them. Social Security recipients should not bear the burden for our national deficit.

My first choice for an appropriate method to require a balanced budget would be the passage of the first bill that I filed upon arriving in Congress in 1979 and which I am reintroducing today. This legislation would amend the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to establish a realistic timetable for balancing the budget that would be enforced by the rules of the House and the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I really believe that if this bill had been enacted when I first introduced it 6 years ago, we would not be in the predicament that we are currently in.

If the Congress cannot balance the budget under its own rules, I would support amending the Constitution to require a balanced budget except in times of war or national emergency. Amending the Constitution presents a fundamental change in U.S. policy, and should not be done lightly. However, the evidence of the past 6 years indicates that to continue to tolerate such enormous deficits as we have seen would threaten the very foundation of the U.S. economy.

The third bill that I am introducing would require the President to submit and the Congressional Budget Committees to report a balanced budget for each fiscal year. The budget deficit is such a serious national problem that all of us must work together—the President, the Congress and the Congressional Budget Committees.

Without decisive action, the budget deficit will continue to grow and threaten the current economic recovery. The last time the Federal Government balanced the budget was in 1969 and the deficit is estimated to grow to $260 billion a year by 1989. Failure to reduce the deficit will keep interest rates high, prolong U.S. dependence on foreign capital, and harm American business.

Although the deficit does pose a serious problem, I do see some promising signs. I was pleased with the passage of the Federal Capital Investment Program Information Act of 1984 that requires the Office of Management and Budget to prepare a Federal capital budget plan. I intend to look into the possibility of further legislation to enact capital budgeting requirements such as Florida and other States use to express their budgets.

In addition, I believe that Congress can learn from Florida's example. Florida has never had a budget deficit because it is strictly forbidden in the State's constitution. Because of this fiscal responsibility, Florida has one of the country's most dynamic and growing economies. The people of Florida support congressional initiatives to balance the budget. In fact, 81 percent of the people responding to my questionnaire supported a constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget. Let us work together, following Florida's example, to require a balanced budget for the Federal Government.●

AN EXAMPLE OF A DEFENSE CONTRACT THAT WENT RIGHT

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, over the past several years we in the U.S. Congress have heard dozens of stories about waste in the Pentagon and contract overcharges for military contracts. Yes, there is far too much of that kind of waste of the taxpayers' money in Pentagon contracting.

However, it is important to point out that not every defense contract has a price overrun or a delivery delay. There are some good workers and some good companies that are doing an excellent job for our Department of Defense, and occasionally we ought to stop and make note of that.

Recently I was visiting the Western Gear Corp., flight structures division, in Jamestown, ND. I came across an example there that I'll bet is representative of a lot of the efforts of conscientious companies and faithful employees delivering good products on time and within budget to our Department of Defense.

Here's a small example of that. In mid 1984 the U.S. Navy requested proposals for the building of an ejector unit on a bomb rack. On August 24, 1984, the invitation for bids went to four qualified bidders. The contract was awarded to Western Gear's flight structures division on October 11, calling for the production and delivery of six ejector units for the bomb racks in 55 days with follow-up deliveries this year.

Workers at that plant in Jamestown, ND, worked many extra hours producing those products and meeting a very short delivery date of 55 days. On December 5, those units were delivered to the U.S. Navy. They were there on time and at the price that was originally negotiated.

Mr. Speaker, I just felt that with all of the depressing stories about defense contracting that we have been hearing, it would be refreshing to cite one positive example that I have come across of a lot of people working hard to produce the right product for the right price and deliver it on time. That happened in North Dakota in December.

A tip of the hat to some good folks in North Dakota who set a good example of the kind of defense contracting that we need more of in this country.●

TRIBUTE TO JUDGE SAM C. BLAIR

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, Judge Sam C. Blair, a well-known public servant and prosecutor in Missouri, died at the age of 80 last week in Jefferson City, MO. As assistant U.S. attorney in Kansas City, Judge Blair was credited with a key role in fighting political corruption.

In his illustrious legal career, Judge Blair served as city counselor to Kansas City, judge of the Missouri Court of Appeals, special counsel to the State Division of Employment Security, and general counsel for the Department of Revenue and State Tax Commission. His 7 terms as judge to the 14th judicial circuit in Cole County were interrupted by his military service as a theater judge advocate on the special staff of Gen. Dwight Eisenhower in World War II.

During Judge Blair's long tenure on the bench, he handed down a number of far-reaching decisions including orders to allow blacks to enroll in the University of Missouri and to allow osteopaths to practice at public hospitals.

He was truly an outstanding man who upheld the highest ideals of the legal profession. He will be greatly missed.●

TRIBUTE TO THE TOLEDO CITY SCHOOL BOARD

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable pride that I inform my colleagues of the recent selection of the Toledo City School Board to receive the U.S. Department of Education's Distinguished School Board Award.

This award is an outgrowth to the National Commission on Excellence in Education. It goes only to those school boards across the Nation who have provided special leadership in developing methods for improving our Nation's public school systems. Only 17 school boards have been designated to receive this award nationwide. The Distinguished School Board Award is, indeed, a significant achievement for the Toledo public school system and it brings with it recognition to our entire community.

The human mind is our fundamental resource. For a wise and just society to flourish, for its citizens to function in an increasingly complicated world, its children must be able to learn to think, to reason, and to grow in knowledge and understanding. Moreover, a strong and expanding regional economy cannot occur without a strong educational system. In a forum on education that I hosted last year, local educators and other community leaders presented their views on the educational preparedness of our young people and their ability to compete academically and technically in the job market. It was clear to me at that time that Toledo's school officials had long been aware of the new challenges confronting our students and were already taking steps to ensure that a firm educational background would prepare them for the marketplace. This award confirms the success of our school board's innovation approaches to the improvement of education in our community.

The late President Kennedy said, "Our progress as a nation can be no swifter than our progress in education. Our requirements for world leadership, our hopes for economic growth and the demands of citizenship itself * * * all require the maximum development of every young American's capacity." The kind of excellence which is demanded is the very excellence we salute today.

Therefore, I hope you will join me today in congratulating the Toledo School Board for this significant achievement. I know they will continue to pursue the standards of excellence which we applaud today.●

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of the House the outstanding service which Mr. Joseph J. Smith has given to the Albertson Hook and Ladder Engine and Hose Company No. 1. This year, Mr. Smith is celebrating his 50th anniversary with the fire department. Through these many years, Mr. Smith has been highly respected in the firehouse and in the Albertson community at large.

Mr. Smith has certainly contributed a great deal to the successful efforts of this fire department and he has the most competent colleagues whose work must also be recognized. Among the officers of the Albertson Fire Department are:

LIST OF OFFICERS

Officers of the Albertson Fire Department: Chief: Herman Fuelling; 1st Assistant Chief: Thomas Tilley; 2nd Assistant Chief: Anthony Bellisari; Captain: Jay Janowitz; 1st Lieutenant: Richard Ockovic; 2nd Lieutenant: William J. Clark, Jr.; Captain of First Aid: Daniel E. Giordano; Captain of Fire Police: Alex Dobkowski; President: Peter Cosgrove; Vice-President: Christopher Carroll; Corresponding Secretary: John Wasielewski; Recording Secretary: Timothy Carroll; Financial Secretary: John Weber; Treasurer: Harry Sherman.

BOARD OF TRUSTEES

Douglas A. Diem, Chairman; Clarence Fuelling, Vice-Chairman; Peter J. Tennis; John Olivari; James DiNapoli; Joseph Radigan; William Clark, Sr.; Jose DaRocha, Secretary; George Lee III, Treasurer.

The excellent community service provided by this firehouse and by other volunteer fire departments throughout our Nation is greatly appreciated by all citizens. We owe an enormous debt of gratitude to these courageous men and women who risk their lives daily to protect the lives and property of others.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Joseph J. Smith and his colleagues at the Albertson Hook and Ladder Engine and Hose Company No. 1 for their many years of fine service and to thank them for a job well done.●

TARIFF REDUCTION FOR POLARIZING MATERIAL

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERING. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to reduce the tariff on imported polarizing material from the current rate of 15.6 to 5.6 percent.

Under current tariff schedules, the tariff on polarizing material, a key component in the production of liquid crystal displays, is 15.6 percent, while the tariff on finished liquid crystal displays is 5.6 percent. The vast majority of polarizing material used by U.S. manufacturers of liquid crystal displays is imported from the Far East. In fact, I have been able to identify only one domestic manufacturer of polarizing material.

As a consequence, it is difficult for U.S. liquid crystal display manufacturers to compete with foreign manufacturers, who benefit not only from the low tariff on their finished product, but also from the much higher tariff on polarizing material. My bill would reduce the tariff on polarizing material to the same level as the tariff on finished liquid crystal displays, thus making American products more competitive. My bill would also eliminate the tariff on polarizing material from least developed countries, in keeping with the current lower rate on polarizing material from those countries.●

NATIONAL MEAT WEEK

HON. GLENN ENGLISH

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 30, 1985

● Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, the week of January 27 through February 2, 1985 has been proclaimed "National Meat Week," and I would like to take this opportunity to recognize this vital part of the American diet. Americans have come to take for granted what was to the founding settlers a rare table delight—good meat. Improved American agriculture and marketing technology have enabled Americans to buy virtually any cut of meat at any time of the year. Americans have grown to expect it. I feel it is a fitting commendation to meat producers throughout the production and marketing chain that we recognize their efforts and successes during National Meat Week.

I also feel that it is an important time to renew our commitment not only to the meat industry, but also to the entire agricultural sector which helps to support the meat industry. For example, without a strong feed grains sector, American consumers would face a totally different meat counter. During the next 2 months, farmers will face an extremely critical time during which they must make planting decisions and, even more important, they must acquire adequate credit to afford to plant. I feel it is important that Congress, the administration, urban and rural communities and banks make a strong commitment to help see these farmers through. Without a healthy farming community, the Nation's urban consumer will pay a hefty bill. I feel it is time for all Americans to recognize that the goose that has been laying the golden eggs is very sick. Without immediate help, the goose could die.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, January 31, 1985, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.
